

UC-NRLF

B 3 540 880

STUDIES IN THE
· ENGLISH MYSTERY PLAYS ·

A THESIS PRESENTED TO THE PHILOSOPHICAL FACULTY OF YALE UNIVERSITY

BY

CHARLES DAVIDSON

A CANDIDATE FOR THE DEGREE OF DOCTOR OF PHILOSOPHY.

1892

Printed by authority of Yale University

724

CONTENTS.

|  | PAGE |
|--|------|
| Bibliography, . . . . .  | 3    |
| I. The Dramatic Element in the Liturgy, . . . . .                              | 6    |
| II. The Doctrine of Transubstantiation as a Dramatic Motive, . . . . .         | 13   |
| III. The Drama of Holy Week in the Catholic Liturgy of Modern Times, . . . . . | 15   |
| IV. The Drama of Holy Week in the York Liturgy, . . . . .                      | 18   |
| V. The Drama of Holy Week in Early Continental Liturgies, . . . . .            | 20   |
| VI. The Rise of the Resurrection Play, . . . . .                               | 28   |
| VII. The Developed Resurrection Play, . . . . .                                | 32   |
| VIII. The Genesis of Christmas, . . . . .                                      | 41   |
| IX. The Growth of the Christmas Cycle, . . . . .                               | 46   |
| X. The Stage and the Play in France, . . . . .                                 | 67   |
| XI. The Stage and the Play in Italy, . . . . .                                 | 69   |
| XII. The Stage and the Play in Germany, . . . . .                              | 72   |
| XIII. The Out door Stage, . . . . .  | 75   |
| XIV. Evidence for Early Italian and Spanish Plays, . . . . .                   | 77   |
| XV. The Attitude of the Clergy toward the Play, . . . . .                      | 79   |
| XVI. The Puy, . . . . .  | 82   |
| XVII. Pageantry in Mediæval England, . . . . .                                 | 83   |
| XVIII. The Development of the Northern Septenar Stanza, . . . . .              | 102  |
| XIX. Certain Stanzas of the Mystery Plays, . . . . .                           | 119  |
| XX. A Survey of the Cycles of Mystery Plays, . . . . .                         | 128  |
| XXI. The Parent Cycle of the York Mystery Plays, . . . . .                     | 137  |
| XXII. The Parent Cycle in the Woodkirk Plays, . . . . .                        | 147  |
| XXIII. The Woodkirk Play, 'Conspiracio et Captio,' . . . . .                   | 153  |
| XXIV. The Play of the Annunciation, . . . . .                                  | 157  |
| XXV. Christ with the Doctors in the Temple, . . . . .                          | 164  |
| XXVI. Correspondences outside of the Parent Cycle, . . . . .                   | 168  |
| XXVII. Conclusion, . . . . .   | 171  |

53123

BIBLIOGRAPHY.

- Analecta Liturgica, published by H. Welter, Paris.
Anglia: Zeitschrift für Englische Philologie.
Antiquary, The.
Archiv für das Studium der neueren Sprachen und Literaturen, herausg. von L. Herrig.
Bain, E., see Merchant and Craft Guilds.
Bartsch, K., Chrestomathie de l'ancien Français.
Böddeker, K., Altenglische Dichtungen des MS. Harl. 2253.
Borlase, Wm., Observations on the Antiquities of Cornwall.
Brand, Rev. John, The History and Antiquities of the Town and County of the Town of Newcastle-upon-Tyne.
Burbidge, E., Liturgies and Offices of the Church.
Chester Plays, The, published by The Shakspeare Society.
Child, F. J., English and Scottish Popular Ballads.
Collier, J. Payne, The History of English Dramatic Poetry to the time of Shaks-peare; and Annals of the Stage to the Restoration.
Cook, Albert S., Judith, an Old English Epic Fragment.
Dalzell, J. G., Scottish Poems of the 16th Century.
D'Ancona, A., Origini del Teatro in Italia.
D'Ancona, A., Sacre Rappresentazioni.
Dante Alighieri, De Vulgari Eloquentia.
Davies, Robert, York Records of the 15th Century.
Du Cange, Glossarium Mediæ et Infimæ Latinitatis.
Du Ménil, E., Origines latines du théâtre moderne.
Dunbar, Wm., The Poems of, ed. by D. Laing.
Early English Text Society's Publications, Nos. 14, 26, 34, 35, 49, 51 (Extra Series).
Ebert, Adolf, see Jahrbuch, etc.
Englische Studien.
Extracts from the Records of Edinburgh, published by The Scottish Burgh Records Society.
Fabian's Chronicles, ed. 1811.
Fosbroke, T. D., Encyclopedia of Antiquities, ed. 1843.
Gentlemen's Magazine, The.
Gerbertus, Martinus, Monumenta Veteris Liturgie Alemannice.
Gospel of Nicodemus, The.
Grand Dictionnaire Universelle.
Gross, Charles, Gild-Merchant.
Grove, Sir George, A Dictionary of Music and Musicians, ed. 1883.
Guest, Edwin, History of English Rhythms, ed. by W. W. Skeat.
Halliwell, J. O., Romance of the Emperor Octavian.

- Halliwell, J. O., Sir Isambard. Camden Society Publications.
- Halliwell-Phillips, J. O., Outlines of the Life of Shakspeare, ed. 1886.
- Handbuch der Klassischen Alterthumswissenschaft, herausg. von Iwan Müller.
- Hase, Carl, Miracle Plays and Sacred Dramas, trans. by A. W. Jackson.
- Haupt's Zeitschrift für deutsches Alterthum.
- Herbert, Wm., History of the Twelve Livery Companies of London.
- Herttrich, Oswald, Studien zu den York Plays, Breslau, 1886.
- Hibbert, F. Aidan, The Influence and Development of English Gilds as illustrated by the History of the Craft Gilds of Shrewsbury.
- Hoffman von Fallersleben, Heinrich, Fundgruben für Geschichte deutscher Sprache und Literatur.
- Holinshed, Raphael, Chronicles of England, Scotland, and Ireland, ed. 1808.
- Hone, Wm., Ancient Mysteries Described, especially the English Miracle Plays.
- Horstmann, Carl, Sammlung Altenglischer Legenden.
- Jahrbuch für Romanische und Englische Literatur*.
- Jubinal, Achille, Mystères Inédits.
- Kelly, Wm., Notices of Leicester.
- Klein, J. L., Geschichte des Dramas.
- Kölbing, Eugen, Altenglische Bibliothek.
- Lambarde, Wm., Dictionarium Anglie Topographicum et Historicum.
- Lüdtke, G., Erl of Tolous and the Empress of Almayn.
- Ludus Coventrie. The Shakspeare Society.
- Lysons, Daniel and Samuel, Magna Britannia.
- McClintock and Strong, Cyclopædia of Biblical, Theological, and Ecclesiastical Literature.
- Machyn, Henry, Diary of, 1550-63, ed. by J. G. Nichols. Camden Society.
- Maguin, Ch., Histoire des Marionettes en Enrope depuis l'antiquité jusqu'à nos jours.
- Marriott, Wm., Collection of English Miracle-Plays or Mysteries.
- Masters, Robert, History of the College of Corpus Christi in the University of Cambridge.
- Merchant and Craft Guilds: A History of the Aberdeen Incorporated Trades.
- Milchsack, Gustav, Die Oster- und Passionspiele.
- Mone, F. J., Schauspiele des Mittelalters.
- Motley, J. L., Rise of the Dutch Republic.
- Muratori, L. A., Antiquitates Italicae Medii Ævi.
- Neander, J. A. W., General History of the Christian Religion and Church.
- Nichols, John, The Progresses and Public Processions of Queen Elizabeth.
- Office of the Holy Week according to the Roman Missal and Breviary in Latin and English*, The, Baltimore, 1829.
- Oliver, Rev. G., History of the Holy Trinity Guild at Sleaford.
- Paris, Gaston, Miracles de Nostre Dame. Société des anciens textes français.
- Parker, J. H. A., Glossary of Terms used in Grecian, Roman, Italian, and Gothic Architecture.
- Percy, Thomas, Reliques of Ancient English Poetry, ed. 1847.
- Petit de Julleville, L., La Comédie en France au moyen âge.
- Petit de Julleville, L., Les Comédiens en France au moyen âge.
- Petit de Julleville, L., Les Mystères.

- Philologus: Zeitschrift für das Klassische Alterthum.
- Pinkerton, John, Ancient Scottish Poems.
- Pollard, A. W., English Miracle Plays, Moralities, and Interludes.
- Presentation in the Temple, The, a Pageant as originally represented by the Corporation of Weavers in Coventry. Abbotsford Club.
- Prynne, Wm., Histrio-Mastix, ed. 1633.
- Records of Aberdeen. Spaulding Club.
- Register of the Gild of Corpus Christi. Surtees Society Publications.
- Retrospective Review.
- Ritson, J., Ancient English Metrical Romances.
- Ritson, J., Ancient English Songs.
- Ritson, J., Poems of Lawrence Minot.
- Robson, John, Three Metrical Romances. Camden Society.
- Rothschild, James de, Le Mistère du Viel Testament.
- Royal Commission on Historical MSS., Ninth Report of.
- Schaff, Philip, History of the Christian Church.
- Schipper, Jacob, Englische Metrik in historischer und systematischer Entwicklung dargestellt.
- Shakespeare, Midsummer Night's Dream.
- Sharp, Thomas, A Dissertation on the Pageants or Dramatic Mysteries anciently performed at Coventry.
- Smith and Cheetham, Dictionary of Christian Antiquities.
- Smith and Wace, Dictionary of Christian Biography.
- Smith, Miss Lucy Toulmin, The York Mystery Plays.
- Smith, Toulmin, English Gilds.
- Smith, Wm., Old Yorkshire.
- Stoddard, F. H., References for Students of Miracle Plays and Mysteries. Univ. of Cal. Library Bulletin, No. 8.
- Stow, John, General Chronicle, ed. by E. Howes.
- Stow, John, Survey of London, ed. by W. J. Thoms.
- Stratman, F. H., A Middle-English Dictionary, ed. by Henry Bradley.
- Strype, John, Ecclesiastical Memorials.
- Ten Brink, Bernard, Geschichte der Englischen Literatur.
- Ticknor, George, History of Spanish Literature.
- Towneley Mysteries. Surtees Society.
- Warton, Thomas, History of English Poetry, ed. 1840.
- Weinhold, K., Weihnachtsspiele und Lieder aus Süddeutschland und Schlesien.
- Whitelaw and Walsh, History of the City of Dublin.
- Wilda, W. E., Gildenwesen im Mittelalter.
- Wilken, E., Geschichte der geistlichen Spiele in Deutschland.
- Wright, Thomas, Early Mysteries and other Latin poems of the Twelfth and Thirteenth Centuries.
- Wright, Thomas, Poems of Walter Mapes.
- Wright, Thomas, The Political Songs of England from the Reign of John to that of Edward II.
- Wright and Halliwell, Reliquiæ Antiquæ.
- York Missal. Surtees Society.
- York Mystery Plays, ed. by Miss L. T. Smith.
- Zeitschrift für deutsches Alterthum, see Haupt.

I.

THE DRAMATIC ELEMENT IN THE LITURGY.

The tragic drama demands a noble soul seeking expression amid adverse conditions, or held back from its goal through collision with opposing circumstance. When the ideal dies out from society the drama dies, or lives only as an echo of the masters so long as the remembrance of former ambitions dwells in the minds of men. For this reason the Roman drama died. At best it was but an echo of the Greek, since ideality was not a Roman trait. At worst, when the integrity of the Roman had yielded to a disbelief in all high aims, it became abhorrent to all right-thinking men. The vulgar called for realistic brutality in the amphitheatre and for beastly lust upon the stage, and the nobles, with a cynicism born of negations, hastened to do their bidding. The genius of the drama forsook the stage for the byeways and hedges, where, as mime and farce, it could still appeal to nature in the primitive man.

The Western world was again without a drama. It had broken the traditions that bound it to the old, and must seek in some new channel for thoughts worthy of dramatic expression. The early Greeks found such in the worship of Dionysus; the inheritors of their worn-out civilization felt in the profoundest sense a dynamic idea in the Christian faith.

We have, then, to seek the sources of the new drama in the Christian ideals.

The climax of a tragedy in life was recognized in the marvelous self-sacrifice of Christ. Around the Eucharist, the memorial of thanksgiving for that death and resurrection, grew up the Christian worship. As a fit approach to that solemn feast, various acts of preparation were introduced, until, as a result, an established mode of procedure, a formal liturgy, expressed the devotion of the disciple not less by action than by word.

At first the familiar worship of the synagogue suggested appropriate additions; and prayers<sup>1</sup> in common, consisting of praise, reading, and supplication,<sup>2</sup> formed a fit introduction to the Eucharist. That this did not, however, become a fixed form within the first century is evident, since 'The Teaching of the Twelve Apostles, after the short outline of a service, adds "But permit the prophets to give thanks in what terms they will,"<sup>1</sup> and Clemens Romanus (97 A. D.) exhorts the Corinthian Church to preserve due order and unity, and makes mention of the Jewish system of priests and sacrifices as furnishing patterns for Christians to follow.<sup>2</sup> Such instructions reveal the pervading influence of Jewish rites and the fluidity of prevailing customs.

<sup>1</sup> Acts 2, 42.<sup>2</sup> Burlidge, p. 3.

The Church, however, was passing into the hands of the Greeks, whose logical and artistic bent of mind sought immediate expression in their adopted worship. There are many evidences to show that the Greeks from the first sought to adorn and extend the ritual from the stores of their own civilization. Dr. Schaff<sup>3</sup> declares that "the Hellenists were much more liberal than the Palestinian Jews. This is evident in the whole Church at Antioch." To the Greeks, then, must we look for the liberalizing of the provincial notions of the Jew.

From such sources, combining Jewish and Grecian elements, the Christian liturgy slowly grew up, until in 103 A. D. Pliny could report<sup>4</sup> to the Emperor Trajan, on the testimony of renegade Christians,

That they had been accustomed on a stated day to assemble before light, and sing amongst themselves in turn a hymn to Christ as God, and to bind themselves by an oath not to commit any crime, but that they would not commit theft or robbery or adultery, nor break their word, nor be false in that which was entrusted to them; and that after this it was their custom to separate, and to meet again to take a meal, but that it was in common and harmless.

This report would seem to reveal to us a divided service; in the early morning a song service with a solemn oath before the day's duties, and later the communion; but we must remember that this is the report of an outsider who may have understood the matter but imperfectly. The Christians adopted fixed hours of prayer from the Jews,<sup>5</sup> one of which was in the early morning. It is quite possible that Pliny confused the morning hour of prayer with the day service. This seems the more probable, since thirty-six years later (A. D. 139) Justin Martyr reports a much more developed service. He says :<sup>6</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Burbidge, p. 20.

<sup>2</sup> Burbidge, p. 5.

<sup>4</sup> Burbidge, p. 26.

<sup>5</sup> Burbidge, p. 112.

<sup>3</sup> Schaff, vol. 1, p. 87.
<sup>6</sup> Burbidge, p. 27.

On the day called Sunday a meeting takes place of all who dwell in cities or in the country, and the memoirs of the Apostles or the writings of the Prophets are read as long as time permits. Then, when the reader ceases, the one who takes the lead admonishes by word of mouth and exhorts to the imitation of these good things. Then we all rise together and put up prayers; and, as was said before, when we have ceased from prayer, bread is offered and wine and water, and he who takes the lead puts up prayers likewise, and thanksgivings according to his ability, and the people give their assent, saying, Amen.

Justin Martyr knew the church service, and his report is authoritative. It reveals a more formal service than that of the first decades, the exercises consisting of Reading, Exhortations, Prayer, the Eucharist, and Thanksgiving. These he names, as we judge from later liturgies, in the order of service. The Eucharist, a thanksgiving in act, closing appropriately with a thanksgiving in word, is fitly introduced by the Prophets or Acts, with exhortation and prayer.

Two hundred years pass by within which is found no extended report of the manner of worship. Then appear the Apostolic Constitutions, from which is drawn the so-called Clementine Liturgy, which is as follows :<sup>1</sup>

Lection from Law and Prophets.<sup>2</sup>

Lection from Epistles.

Lection from Gospels.

Sermon.

Litanies for Catechumens, etc., and Dismissal.

Litany for Faithful.

The Peace of God be with you all.

Kiss of Peace.

Washing of Hands.

Offering of the Gifts.<sup>3</sup>

Prayer of Bishop.

The Grace of Almighty God, and the Love, etc.,

Sursum Corda.

Preface ending with Sanctus.

Commemoration of the work of Redemption.

Words of Institution: In the night in which He was betrayed.

Offering in remembrance of Passion.

Invocation of Holy Spirit.

Prayer for the whole Church, including the faithful departed.

Peace of God be with you all. Prayer of Humble Access.

Holy things to Holy. R. One holy, etc. Glory to God in the highest, etc.

Communion. Psalm xxxiv.

Thanksgiving.

Blessing.

<sup>1</sup> Burbidge, Front.

<sup>2</sup> The Little Entrance or Introit.

<sup>3</sup> The Great Entrance or Offertory.

In this liturgy of the fourth century we see much more clearly the dramatic character of the service, which may now be roughly divided into two acts. The Eucharist holds as ever the commanding position. The first act is one of preparation; the second leads directly to the Eucharist, its fitting climax.

As to the method of division in this inchoate drama there may be different views. Klein,<sup>1</sup> having in mind the Liturgy of St. Chrysostom,<sup>2</sup> in which a 'Preparation' precedes the Introit, casts the church service into three acts, the first closing immediately before the Introit, the second before the Great Entrance. Dr. Schaff<sup>3</sup> holds that every Oriental liturgy is a symbolical drama of two acts, the second act beginning with Sursum Corda. It might be as satisfactory to consider the liturgy as a drama of two acts, the first beginning with the Introit—the Introduction, where there is one, being treated as a species of prologue—and the second opening with the Great Entrance.

The exact method of division is immaterial. The fact remains that we have in the Clementine Liturgy a dramatic framework which needed only the interspersion of the quick exchange of act and speech to form a veritable drama. This need, however, was a serious one, and a rival sect was not slow, as we shall see, to take advantage of the defect.

In some form singing of psalms had been a feature of the church worship from the first. There had been some definite assignment of musical parts in temple and synagogue worship;<sup>4</sup> moreover, Psalms 24 and 134 appear to have been composed for antiphonal singing. Philo speaks of such singing among the Essenes, in language which agrees closely with that used by Basil, Bishop of Caesarea, in 370 A. D., when he says,<sup>5</sup> "And now, divided into two parts, they sing alternately to each other. Afterwards they commit the leading of the melody to one, and the rest follow him." Pliny's statement that the Christians sang "amongst themselves in turn" proves its survival among the Christians.

Nevertheless, whatever the method of singing may have been, that lively alternation, which gives movement and interest to antiphonal singing, must have been lacking. Indeed there are signs that music itself fell into disuse or was of little prominence, for no writer after St. Chrysostom could have omitted, as did Justin Martyr,<sup>6</sup> all mention of it, in a description of the service.

<sup>1</sup> Klein, vol. 4, p. 10.<sup>2</sup> Burbidge, Front.<sup>3</sup> Schaff, vol. 3, p. 534.<sup>4</sup> Smith's Dict. of Christian Biog. s. v. Ignatius.<sup>5</sup> Burbidge, p. 13. <sup>6</sup> See p. 8.

About the middle of the fourth century the orthodox church saw dark days. The Arian sect, with its taking hymnology, was militant in the Christian world. The orthodox Bishop of Antioch was driven into exile, and the fortunes of the faithful sank to a low ebb. It was at this time, tradition says, that Flavius<sup>1</sup> and Diodorus of Antioch revived—or, possibly more accurately, invented—antiphonal singing. In any case, the time was ripe for it. St. John Chrysostom<sup>2</sup> used it in processions to combat Arian hymnology, and Ambrose,<sup>3</sup> Bishop of Milan, brought it to the West.

For many characteristics of antiphonal singing the church was probably indebted to the Greek drama. The Arian hymnology had made clear the need of a more prominent musical element, but does not, so far as can now be determined, satisfactorily explain the peculiar arrangement of antiphonal singing. If one will place the liturgical service side by side with one of the old Greek tragic dramas, he will be struck by the correspondence of function between the choir of the one and the chorus of the other. This pertains not alone to the frequent dividing and reuniting of chorus and choir respectively, nor to the distribution of the singing throughout the action of the play and liturgy, but is present in a more subtle sense. The chorus interprets and accentuates the action of the drama, but rarely advances it. The choir discharges the same office continually for the service of the liturgy, as it passes on to its climax in the Eucharist.

If now the Responsoria are added to this forming liturgy—which, however, tradition assigns to the Italians, but which seem so close a copy of the interchange of speech between the protagonist and chorus, and are so strikingly akin to the antiphon that one must suspect a common origin—the liturgy has received in the fourth century that final form and texture which through the use of fifteen centuries has remained practically unaltered. Additions, expansions, intrusions, have at times been made, but the Roman and English liturgies of to-day are essentially the same as St. Chrysostom's Liturgy of the fourth century.

Nor should it be thought singular that the Fathers looked to the classic theater for aid. The theater had a strong hold upon the people; witness Tertullian's<sup>4</sup> De Spectaculis (A. D. 200) against plays, and St. John Chrysostom's<sup>5</sup> threat of excommunication, if any of his

<sup>1</sup> Smith's Dict. of Christian Biog. s. v. Flavius.

<sup>2</sup> Schaff, vol. 3, p. 579.

<sup>3</sup> Smith's Dict. of Christian Biog. s. v. Ambrose.

<sup>4</sup> Hase, p. 1.

<sup>5</sup> Hase, p. 5.

flock attended theaters on holy days. That they should go for aid to the classic plays, which were still used for closet study, is no stranger than that they should adopt the Roman basilica for a church type, or plant Christmas' upon the Roman Saturnalia. The church had need of these things, and used them so wisely that it made out of the skeleton of the Clementine Liturgy an artistically complete symbolical drama in the St. Chrysostom Liturgy. The symbolical character of their worship was emphasized by historical, typical, and allegorical<sup>2</sup> pictures, among which 'Adam and Eve,' the 'Adoration of the Magi,' and the 'Shepherd who carries the Lost Lamb upon his Shoulders' are enumerated.<sup>3</sup> Some of these were passing out of use by the middle of the fourth century, as discarded molds, no longer suitable for the thought of the church. Furthermore, the readiness with which the church assimilated Greek culture is easily accounted for when we reflect that<sup>4</sup> "to Justin Martyr, Origen, and Clement of Alexandria, Greek philosophy was the bridge to the Christian faith."

However, the distance from the symbolical drama to the tragic is not easily passed. It cannot be bridged by any development of symbolism itself. The difference is essential and intrinsic. In the first place, abstract thought that does not admit of concrete presentation cannot form even a symbolical drama. Hence where philosophy, as in India, has dominated thought since the rise of literature, there can be no true drama.

The Hindoos' one attempt to form a mystery play, the Prabodha-Chandrodaya,<sup>5</sup> the Birth of Ideas, shows, through the superlative hideousness of its allegorical actors, the violent forcing of material into unnatural expression. Even in the florescence of Attic tragedy the authors recognized vaguely that the rising schools of philosophy were their foes. When the domination of Attic thought by philosophy was finally complete, the drama forsook its ideals, and sought for motive in society and intrigue.

In the Christian liturgy, symbolism presented at second hand the concrete embodiment of the profoundest ethical philosophy, since the tableaux and allegories pictured the story of Christ, who offered in his own life and action a solution of the ethical problems of the race. The true literary expression of this material was found in the allegorical poems so abundant in the Middle Ages, which ultimately

<sup>1</sup> Wilken, pp. 1, 2.

<sup>2</sup> Schaff, vol. 2, p. 274.

<sup>3</sup> I find no evidence of living tableaux in the church at this date, as given by Klein, vol. 4, p. 11.

<sup>4</sup> Schaff, vol. 1, p. 78.

<sup>5</sup> Klein, vol. 3, p. 15.

attained their richest flowering in the Divina Commedia and the Fairy Queen. The true drama demands material that can be made one with the actor. The profoundest philosophy can be presented, as in Hamlet or King Lear, but it must be presented indirectly through the life, or the results arising from the life, of the actor.

The tragic drama demands situations that shall excite the deepest emotions in the spectator, and as agent a soul great enough to combat mighty influences, that the beholder's liveliest sympathy may be called into action. Can these conditions be met by a drama that attains its climax in a thank-offering? If not, then, after the symbolical drama was established in the Christian liturgy, further dramatic advance was impossible. The service might be loaded with ornament—incense, genuflections, vestments; but these could only cloud the simple dramatic outline of the early liturgy. The passage to true dramatic expression remained impossible.

Meanwhile, the old drama had sunk into utter darkness, beneath the contempt of men and through the puerility and grossness of its matter. For five centuries the world waited for the drama. From the Christian worship, its proper source, it could not come without some essential change within the liturgy itself, yet the thought of Europe was wholly taken up with the story of the Christ and the wonderful plan of salvation which had been elaborated by the theologians.

It is true that there are signs that a drama might have arisen in time from another source. The pastoral of Theocritus had developed in dialogue. Whether, without the aid of the religious drama, it could have acquired sufficient plot of dramatic quality to form even the pastoral drama which later spread through Western Europe, is an interesting question. Its indebtedness to the religious drama can be plainly seen in Spain, where Enzina<sup>1</sup> used the church drama as an aid to the pastoral, and set the type for Spain and Portugal. But the passage from pastoral to tragedy would have been a giant stride, and proved unnecessary, for within the liturgy grew up the needful tragic motive, and from that sprang the religious drama. It becomes our next task to show the shifting of standpoint within the liturgy which arose from the acceptance of a new theological dogma, to detect the introduction of a genuinely tragic moment, and to trace the growth of dramatic expression within the church service itself.

<sup>1</sup> Ticknor, vol. 1, p. 345.

II.

THE DOCTRINE OF TRANSUBSTANTIATION AS A DRAMATIC MOTIVE.

It is probable that from a very early day the church considered the Eucharist as something more than a commemorative breaking of bread. It is certain that within the first centuries the belief that in some mystical, spiritual sense Christ was present in the Lord's Supper was prevalent in the church. But this mysticism, so attractive to the mind of the Oriental, is contrary to the habits of Western thought, which seeks for reality beneath speculation, and for a philosophy that can be mirrored in the life. Therefore we see without surprise as early as the sixth century signs of approaching materialistic views of the Eucharist. St. Gregory's words,<sup>1</sup> "Take this bread and offer it as a sacrifice for my sins," show that the propitiatory idea was superseding the idea of thank-offering. Still it won its way but slowly. It is not found in the Liturgy of St. Gregory, upon which the mediæval Mass was built, though with many additions.<sup>2</sup>

Not until the ninth century<sup>3</sup> did the doctrine of the Sacrament become an object of controversy. The issue was defined when Radbertus propounded the doctrine of Transubstantiation, in his treatise addressed to Charles the Bald.<sup>4</sup> The controversy that immediately arose shows how foreign such views were to the theological thought of the time. Nevertheless, once formulated, the tenet rapidly gained credence, and the treatment which Berengar<sup>5</sup> received in the eleventh century, because he held that Christ was present in the Eucharist in a spiritual sense only, proves how completely the doctrine of the Real Presence had gained the day.

Within these two centuries, from the last half of the ninth to the first half of the eleventh, this most momentous change had taken place in Christian thought. Within these two centuries the dramatic development of the liturgy began in all countries of the Roman Catholic faith. This is more than coincidence. It is cause and effect. The dramatic element, hitherto lacking in the Christian liturgy, was now present through a belief that aroused the most intense emotions in the worshiper. Day after day the devout among the clergy saw the Son of God offered up, a present sacrifice, for their sins. What act of more awful import could be imagined!

<sup>1</sup> Burbridge, p. 95.<sup>2</sup> Burbridge, p. 67.<sup>3</sup> Schaff, vol. 3, p. 492.<sup>4</sup> McClintock and Strong, s. v. Lord's Supper.<sup>5</sup> Schaff, vol. 4, p. 556.

And when the church services, following the incidents of His life, came around to the dates of His death and resurrection, what longing must have possessed them to present vividly to the ignorant and heedless multitude those moments now stored for them with such sacred meaning !

The liturgical drama, therefore, is the legitimate outgrowth of a situation well stated by Dr. Schaff :

In the sacrifice of the mass the whole mysterious fulness and glory of the Catholic worship is concentrated. Here the idea of the priesthood reaches its dizzy summit, and here the devotion and awe of the spectator rises to the highest pitch of adoration.<sup>1</sup>

Or it may be stated in words which the Catholic Church accepts :

The Church commemorates every day the bloody sacrifice of Jesus Christ on the Cross, by a true and real unbloody sacrifice : in which she offers to God the same body and blood that were given for the sins of the world.<sup>2</sup>

These words, through continual repetition and the unbelief of our day, no longer appeal, even to those who accept them, with a tithe of the force with which they impressed the credulous minds of mediæval times. To them the immediate result was a notable increase in the spirit of devotion, which expressed itself in the elaborate rituals, and in the desire to present this awful sacrifice to the people as vividly as the priests themselves felt it. This dramatic development of the liturgy did not owe its origin to the frivolous and irreverent among the clergy, though these, doubtless, eagerly seized upon it for amusement, but to the reverent desire of the pious to present Christ's life vividly to the people, a desire that could now find true dramatic expression, since the Mass was no longer a symbol, but a veritable life history, closing before the eyes of the spectators in a most sublime self-sacrifice.

Thus it came about that under the new view of the Eucharist the liturgy presented dramatic moments of heightened interest at each salient point of Christ's career. These fall naturally into two groups : those of his birth and childhood, and those that pertain to his death and resurrection, the latter forming a group of most intensely dramatic value.

As Sunday after Sunday the people see the Christ actually lifted up before them, the sense of the reality of the sacrifice grows. When with Holy Week the altars are stripped and continual supplication and lamentation fill the church, they are prepared to feel on

<sup>1</sup> Schaff, vol. 3, p. 505.

<sup>2</sup> The Office of the Holy Week.

Good Friday that an actual sacrifice of momentous consequence to them is taking place. The new sense of the import of this sacrifice heightens the devotional feeling in the clergy, and they long to make this as real to the people as it is to themselves, and sometimes to make it as vivid to their own consciousness as it is to their faith. This led to a more realistic presentation of the awful sacrifice and of the joy of the Resurrection.

We must not, however, expect that the history of these dramatic moments will be the same. The Crucifixion was too solemn a thing for elaborate realism, but the Resurrection readily lent itself to dramatic presentation. Therefore we must expect to find the Crucifixion a reverent but slightly developed drama, until it passed into the hands of the people, and time and custom had deadened their sense of its sacredness.

---

III.

THE DRAMA OF HOLY WEEK IN THE CATHOLIC LITURGY OF MODERN TIMES.

We turn now to the records that remain, and will attempt to trace the development of these two dramatic moments, considering first the dramatic traces in the modern Roman Liturgy of Holy Week, and next in the old English liturgies, passing thence to the more elaborate development in the liturgies of the continent, where we will trace the Crucifixion and the Resurrection independently.

The liturgy of modern times, according to the author<sup>1</sup> chosen, admits of the following sketch of dramatic action.

THE MORNING OFFICE FOR GOOD FRIDAY.

THE MASS.

The Priest and his Ministers, in black vestments, go to the Altar, without lights and incense, and prostrate themselves before it: while the Acolytes cover it with one linen cloth. The gospel is St. John 18. After the prayers the Priest puts off his vestment, and taking from the Altar the Cross covered with a veil, he goes to the epistle-corner, where he uncovers the top of it, and shows it to the people, singing the Antiphon: Ecce lignum crucis. Then the Deacon and Subdeacon join with him in singing the rest: In quo salus mundi pependit. And the choir prostrate on the ground answers: Venite, adoremus. From thence the Priest proceeds to the right side of the Altar, where he uncovers the right arm of the Cross, singing a second time, ecce lignum, as before. Lastly, he goes to the middle of the Altar, and uncovers the whole Cross, singing a third time, ecce lignum. After this, he carries it to a place prepared before the Altar, where he adores first himself, and then the clergy and laity, all kneeling thrice on both knees, and kissing the feet of the Crucifix. When the adoration of the Cross is almost finished, the candles upon the Altar are lighted, and after the adoration the Cross is placed again upon the Altar.

---

<sup>1</sup> The Office of the Holy Week.

Afterwards the Priest receives in communion the host that has been consecrated on Maundy Thursday, and placed in a tabernacle appropriately decorated and lighted.

There is in this no sign of the mediæval custom of placing Christ in the sepulchre, but our author states that a custom, which is very significant, is observed by the laity. After the host is placed in the tabernacle on Maundy Thursday, it is visited by the laity, who call this 'Visiting Sepulchres,'<sup>1</sup> which our author cannot reconcile with "lights and the richest ornaments; things very unbecoming a sepulchre."

This custom is, however, easily explained, if we compare with the modern service the ceremony as given by the York Missal<sup>2</sup> of the twelfth century. I omit all before the adoration, as the variations are unimportant and foreign to our purpose. It reads :

Dum populus adorât, canatur Antiphona cum Versu. . . Tandem adorata Cruce, bajulent eam duo Vicarii usque ad locum sepulchri, ubi Prælatus eam accipiens incipiat has Antiphonas, et Chorus finiat. . . Postea Prælatus ponat flexis genibus Crucem in sepulchro et duos cereos accensos cum duobus ureis; postea thurificet eam, et tunc erectus incipiat Antiphonam.

Although in the Missal for Good Friday nothing is said about placing a host with the crucifix in the sepulchre, we know that it was done; for, in the Missal for Thursday, Feria V. in die Cenæ, we read:<sup>3</sup>

Ponantur a Diacono tres hostiæ ad consecrandum, quarum duæ reserventur in crastinum, una ad percipiendum ab Exeuntore Officii; reliqua, ut ponatur cum Cruce in Sepulchro.<sup>4</sup>

<sup>1</sup> The Office of the Holy Week, p. 183.

<sup>2</sup> The York Missal, vol. 1, pp. 106-7. Note.—MS. A, owned by Rev. John Gott, Leeds, Eng., is in part of the twelfth century, in part of the fifteenth. MS. D is in the library of Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge. It is of the fifteenth century, and contains many rubrics not given in the other six MSS. The portion of MS. A used in this work is of the twelfth century. The portions from MS. D are noted.

<sup>3</sup> The York Missal, p. 97, MS. D.

<sup>4</sup> In the abbey church of Durham the host was inclosed in crystal, and set into the breast of the image of the Savior. Hone's Ancient Mysteries, p. 223, quoting from Davies's Rites of the Cathedral of Durham.

That is, the first of the three is used on Thursday, the second on Friday after the priest returns to the altar, and the third rests in the sepulchre.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Parker's Glossary of Architecture gives under 'Sepulchre' the following: "A representation of the entombment of our Savior, set up in the Roman Catholic church at Easter on the north side of the chancel, near the altar; in this country previous to the Reformation, it was most commonly a wooden erection, and placed within a recess in the wall or upon a tomb, but several churches still contain permanent stone structures that were built for that purpose, some of which are very elaborate, and are ornamented with a variety of decorations, as at Navenby and Heckington, Lincolnshire; and Hawton, Nottinghamshire, all of which are beautiful specimens of the Decorated style: sepulchres of this kind also remain in the churches at Northwold, Norfolk; Holecumbe Burnell, Southpool, and Woodleigh, Devonshire; and in several others. . . . The lower part generally contains representations of sleeping soldiers, intended for the Roman guard."

Britton's Redcliffe Church, p. 27, quoted by Parker:—

Item, That Maister Canynge hath deliver'd this 4th day of July, in the year of our Lord, 1470, to Maister Nicholas Petters, vicar of St. Mary Redcliffe: Moses Conterin, Philip Barthelmew, procurators of St. Mary Redcliffe, aforesaid: a new sepulchre well gilt with golde, and a civer thereto.

Item, An image of God Almighty rising out of the same sepulchre, with all the ordinance that 'longeth thereto, (that is to say) a lathe made of timber and the iron-work thereto.

Item, Thereto 'longeth Heaven, made of timber and stain'd clothes.

Item, Hell made of timber, and iron-work thereto, with Divels to the number of 13.

Item, 4 Knights armed, keeping the sepulchre, with their weapons in their hands; that is to say, 2 axes and 2 spears, with 2 pavés.

Item, 4 payr of Angels' wings for 4 Angels, made of timber and well painted.

Item, The Fadre, the Crowne and Visage, the ball with a Cross upon it, well gilt with fine gould.

Item, The Holy Ghosht coming out of Heaven into the sepulchre.

Item, Longeth to the 4 Angels 4 Chevelers.

Articles of Visitation, by Abp. Crammer, 2 Ed. VI., quoted by Parker:—

Item, Whether they had upon Good Friday last past the sepulchres with their lights, having the Sacrament therein.

Test. Johan. de Ledes, 1379. Test. Ebor. 196, quoted by Parker:—

Lego duo tapeta rubea dicta ecclesie meae pro reparacione sepulchri in die parasceus.

Accompts of S. Helen's, Abingdon. Archaeol. vol. 1, p. 16, quoted by Parker:—

A. D. 1558: Payde for making the Sepulture, 10s.

For peynting the same sepulture, 3s.

For stones, and other charges about it, 4s. 6d.

To the sexton for meat and drink, and watching the sepulture, according to custom, 22d.

Hone's Ancient Mysteries, p. 221, quoting the Beehive of the Romish Church, says: "Yea, and in some places, they make the grave in a hie place in the church where men must goe up manie steppes, which are decked with blacke cloth from above to beneath, and vpon euery steppe standeth a siluer candlesticke with a waxe candle burning in it, and there do walke souldiours in harnesse, as bright as Saint George, which keepe the grave, till the priests come and take him up: and then commeth sodenlie a flash of fire, wherewith they are all afraid and fall downe: and then vpstarts the man, and they begin to sing Alleluia, on all hands, and then the clock strikes eleuen."

IV.

THE DRAMA OF HOLY WEEK IN THE YORK LITURGY.

We turn now to the Easter service in the mediæval liturgies, and place the York liturgy in comparison with the continental order of service. An interesting situation is revealed. In the York Missal the traces of dramatic action are scattered, as in the modern liturgy, through the services of Easter, Easter Monday, and Easter Tuesday, not concentrated, as in the continental liturgies, in the service of Easter. In the Victimæ Paschali Laudes occurs :

Die nobis, Maria ! quid vidisti in via ?
 Sepulchrum Christi viventis, et gloriam vidi resurgentis,
 Angelicos testes, sudarium et vestes,
 Surrexit Christus spes mea, præcedet vos in Galilæam.

This is repeated also on Monday and Tuesday. On Monday we find the verse preceding to be :

Angelus Domini descendit de cælo, et accedens revolvit lapidem, et sedebat super eum.

On Tuesday the verse is :

Surrexit Dominus de sepulchro, qui pro nobis pependit in ligno.

In the York Missal the Resurrection Drama also appears in a broken and disconnected condition. On Easter Sunday, after blessing the fire and the water, the clergy assume festal garments, but the Victimæ Paschali Laudes is not the Sequence for the day, so there is absolutely nothing of a dramatic nature in the Easter service. In Feria ii post Pascha, however, we find clear traces. Luke 24. 13-35, is read. The Offertorium gives :<sup>1</sup>

Angelus Domini descendit de cælo, et dixit mulieribus : quem quæritis ? surrexit, sicut dixit, alleluia.

In Feria iii post Pascha appears :<sup>2</sup>

V. Angelus Domini descendit de cælo, et accedens revolvit lapidem, et sedebat super eum.

V. Respondens autem angelus dixit mulieribus : Quem quæritis ? Ille autem dixerunt : Jesum Nazarenem.

Then follow the Victimæ Paschali Laudes, containing :

Die nobis, Maria, quid vidisti in via ?
 Sepulchrum Christi viventis, et gloriam vidi resurgentis,
 Angelicos testes, sudarium et vestes,
 Surrexit Christus spes nostra, præcedet vos in Galilæam.
 Credendum est magis soli Mariæ veraci, quam Judæorum turbæ fallaci.
 Scimus Christum surrexisse a mortuis vere ; tu nobis, victor Rex, miserere.

<sup>1</sup> York Missal, p. 128.

<sup>2</sup> York Missal, p. 129.

How much acting accompanied this song it is impossible to state with certainty, but one may venture the supposition that a portion of the choir or certain priests sang the question: "Die nobis, Maria, quid vidisti in via?," that the three following lines were sung by single voices personating the three Mariæ respectively, that the former singers then followed with the line beginning "Credendum," and that all joined in the last line. There is nothing in the text to indicate the method of rendering. The passage is in prose as given above, not in verse, as the passage given by Pollard<sup>1</sup> seems to be.

This ends the direct evidence from the York Missal, but not the indirect. There must have been more to this drama than that indicated in the text. In the Good Friday service the crucifix and host were placed in the sepulchre to await a resurrection on Easter, as we know from the continental liturgies. No account of this resurrection is given, and, as there is a distinct change in the service on Easter, when, after days of mourning vestures and lamentation, Prælati cum septem vel quinque Diaconibus dalmaticis, et totidem Subdiaconibus tunicatis festive paratis. precedentibus Cereferariis et duobus Thuriferis, introeat ad Altare.

I incline to the opinion that the Resurrection Play took place immediately before that action.

That the directions for the drama should be omitted is not strange, as in many churches, continental as well as English, the Play was regarded as foreign to the service and excluded from the Missal. Moreover, we have direct references to such plays in two places in the York Missal. On Christmas—Ad Missam in Gallicantu,<sup>2</sup> MS. D says:

Peractisque ibidem omnibus quæ juxta morem dicenda vel facienda sunt, incipiat Executor Officiis ad Altare Gloria in excelsis cum nota de angelis.

And for Ad Magnam Missam MS. D adds:<sup>3</sup>

Et peractis omnibus ibidem, quæ peragenda sunt, incipiat Sacerdos orationem.

These prove the recognized standing of such plays, though outside of the Missal, and also that the directions for them were not always inserted, as MS. D alone has them, the other MSS. being notably deficient in rubrics in many places. This closes the York testimony concerning these plays, and we pass to the continent, as I have not the Sarum Use at hand.

<sup>1</sup> Pollard, p. xv.

<sup>2</sup> York Missal, p. 14.

<sup>3</sup> York Missal, p. 18.

V.

THE DRAMA OF HOLY WEEK IN EARLY CONTINENTAL LITURGIES.

The traces left in the Alemannic liturgy will serve to illustrate the dramatic features of the continental service.

Ordo in Parasceve:<sup>1</sup>

& cruce salutata, & in suo loco reposita.

Ordo in Parasceve:<sup>2</sup>

Interim Sacerdos fumat viaticum, eatque ad sepulchrum cum incenso & candelis cantando R. Agnus Dei Christus. Ecce quomodo moritur, cum Versibus & repetitionibus, ponensque illud in sepulchrum incenset, & claudens illud cantet R. Sepulto Domino, cum Versu & repetitione, ponaturque cereus ardens ante sepulchrum.

These extracts will suffice to show that the German churches were practically in accord with the English as regards the Burial Play.

The act of crucifixion we might suppose too painful a scene for realistic presentation in the service, and so it seems to have been in England, but on the continent it received a peculiar dramatic treatment. The lamentation on Good Friday for the death of Christ was, in Germany, Jerem. chap. i, sung with a touching melody.<sup>3</sup> This was superseded by a lamentation of Mary of which we have examples in both Latin and German. There are many of these 'Marienklagen.' They were not all, however, designed for the Good Friday service. Some are addressed to Christ upon the cross; others show plainly by their content that they were sung by Mary in the Easter service, sometimes just before the Maries began their walk to the tomb, at other times on the way and leading up to the Resurrection proper. The dramatic development of the former was evidently suggested by the Biblical narrative. Mary addresses her Son and He replies. As to how the response was contrived we have no information.

Probably the first steps of this development have been lost, since the earliest form that we have is in metre and in a somewhat complicated stanza. From a Saint Blasien MS. of 1440 at Karlsruhe Mone gives:<sup>4</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Gerbertus, vol. 2, p. 204.

<sup>2</sup> Mone, p. 204.

<sup>3</sup> Gerbertus, vol. 2, p. 235.

<sup>4</sup> Mone, p. 42.

Planetus B. Mariæ virginis ad filium in cruce pendentem :

Virgo plorans filium ductus ad supplicium :
Dic o rex humilium,
fili quid fecisti ?
quia gens incredula,
mordax velut vipera,
te traxit ad vincula et crucem subisti.

This continues through thirteen stanzas. Then :

Responsio afflicti filii ad mæstissimam matrem.

This Responsio closes the song in five stanzas.

The next step of dramatic development is shown in a MS. of 1439, now in the library of Karlsruhe, but written in Florence.<sup>1</sup> The metre is more simple, but the lyrical dialogue has been greatly expanded. It begins :

Ante crucem virgo stabat,
Christi pœnas cogitabat, totam se dilaniabat,
vultum lavat lacrimis, and continues through eight stanzas, when Christ replies in four stanzas, Mary answering in three. Then, Respondet crux Mariæ in seven stanzas, Mary replies in three, and the cross closes the dialogue in four.<sup>2</sup>

Our next example passes from the language of the church to the tongue of the people. The MS. is judged to be of about 1430.<sup>3</sup> I give it in full, as it is comparatively short, and yet contains all the distinctive features of the lamentation after it had passed into the vulgar tongue.<sup>4</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Mone, p. 37.

<sup>2</sup> Note.—Compare with these the “Stabat Mater: The Lamentation of the Blessed Virgin Mary, a Sequence or Prose, appointed, in the Roman Missal, to be sung between the Epistle and the Gospel, at High Mass, on the Friday in Passion Week, and the Third Sunday in September. The Poem, written towards the close of the thirteenth century by Jacobus de Benedictus, is one of the finest examples of mediæval Latin prose.”—Grove’s Dictionary of Music and Musicians s. v. Stabat Mater.

<sup>3</sup> Note.—It should be borne in mind that most of these plays are older than the MSS. containing them. Nevertheless, the development in Germany seems to have been slower than elsewhere, and consequently many steps of development, elsewhere lost, have been preserved there.

<sup>4</sup> Hoffman, vol. 2, p. 281.

Marie klage.

Planctus in magna sexta feria.Primo Iohannes dicit :

Høret lieben liute überal
 Einen jæmerlichen schal.
 Maria ist herkomen
 Und hât leidigin mære vernomen :
 Ir liebez kint sî gevangen
 Und an ein kriuze gehangen.

Maria dicit :

Johannes lieber vriunt mîn
 Daz dû salec müezest sîn,
 Wise mich an die stat
 Dâ dû mîn kint gelâzen hâst.

Iohannes dicit demonstrando super. . . :

Maria sich an dîn kint,
 Daz die argen juden blint
 An ein kriuze habent geslagen :
 Des müz ich dir helfen klagen.

Maria cantando procedit :

Owê owê des ganges des ich gân
 Mit jâmer und mit riuwen.
 Ich mac gesitzen noch gestân,
 Mîn leit wil sich verniuwen.

Iesus cantat :

Eli, lamma sabacthani, Deus meus ut quam dereliquisti me ?

Judari annectant claros.Maria cantat :

Owê ich høre einen rûf :
 Daz ist mîn kint Jesus der mich
 beschûf,
 Daz vernim ich an der stimme.
 Ich høre die hemer klingen
 Und in sîn in angst und nôt.
 Owê und warich vor im tût !
 Owê ich gên wider oder vür,
 Ez trit ouch nieman vür die tür
 Der dise marter wende :
 Des windich mine hende.
 Ich schrie lût owê owê,
 Nu tortet mich und lât in gên.

Maria dicit :

Johannes lieber vriunt mîn,
 Nû gêwir zû der marter sîn,
 Und hilf mir klagen miniu leit
 Diu mîn sendez herze treit.

Iohannes dicit :

Maria mûter reine,
Weinen müge wir beide.
Wan uns nieman troestet mër :
Owê mir hiute und immermêr.

Maria cantat :

Sihestu wie er henget
Und wie daz blût rennet
Ûz sinem reinen libe ?

(Iesus dicit :)

Sieh, mûter, sich ! Din kint bin ich
Und daz jâmerlichen hange.
Des sünders tût ich nicht enwil.
Johanni dem bevillh ich dich.

Iohannes dicit ad Mariam :

Mûter lâz din trûren sîn.
Johannes sol wesen der sun din
Und dû diu mûter sîn.

Iesus ad Iohannem dicit :

Dû solt ir sun wesen,
Sô muget ir beide wol genesen.

Maria cantat :

Owê owê ! weinen was mir unbekant.
Sît ich mûter was genant
Und doch mannes âne.
Owê ! nû ist ze weinen mir geschehen.
Sint ich sînen tût mûz sehen
Den ich âne smerzen gar
Mûter unde meit gebar.

[Here follow some illegible Latin verses of which the following is the translation] :

Sun Johannes unde neve min.
Dû solt klagen min leit und daz din.
Sider unz ze leid ist geschehn.
Herzeleide müteze wir jehn.
Owê ach und jamers zit
Diu an sinem tode lit.
Dâvon mir ein scharpfez swert
Mîne sêle gar durchvert.

Iohannes :

O Maria stella maris
our tam grave contristaris ? etc.

A still further development is shown by a plaint of the thirteenth century—the MS. is, however, of the fifteenth century—which is also given by Hoffmann.<sup>1</sup> It begins 'Incipit planctus Mariæ virginis,' contains 406 verses, and is accompanied, as is the case with nearly all German Marienklagen, with the music. The stage directions are in Latin, and the first song that John and Peter sing is in prose Latin. The Savior also says : "Mulier, ecce filius tuus," and "Ecce mater tua" in speaking to John, but follows each with four verses in German. The actors are Mary, John, Peter, and the crucified Savior. The passage of time is shown, and is evidently intended to cover the time that Mary was by the cross in the Biblical narrative.

As kindred to the above complaints we can best consider here the lamentations that precede the Resurrection Play on Easter. In a parchment MS. in the cloister of Lichtenthal near Baden, in a handwriting of the thirteenth century, is found what Mone<sup>2</sup> declares to be the oldest German piece that he has discovered. It begins :

[MARIA :]

Awe der iemerleichen clag, di ich muter eine trag
 von dez totez wanne !
 weinen waz mir unbechant,
 sit ich muter was genant, und doch mannes anne :
 nu ist ze beinen mir geschehen,
 seit ich deinen tot muz sehen.
 aube der laiden merre !
 wäinen, clagen muz ich han,
 sam der freude ni gewan,
 von meinez hertzen swerre.
 aube tot, diseu not maht du mir wol enden, wilt du von dir her zu mir
 deinem poten senden.

Three stanzas of the same construction follow, then John speaks one stanza, then Mary and John continue the conversation through six stanzas of a different construction. The preparation for the walk to the sepulchre is announced by six Latin verses, and Mary's decision to visit the sepulchre is given in the words :

Sed eamus et ad ejus
 properemus tumulum, si dileximus viventem,<sup>3</sup>
 diligamus mortuum.

<sup>1</sup> Hoffmann, vol. 2, p. 260.

<sup>2</sup> Mone, p. 27 and p. 31.

<sup>3</sup> See pp. 25, 33.

This leads us to the consideration of the songs, not lamentations, which sometimes contained the Easter Play in embryo, and sometimes were introductory to it. Of the former we have this of the fourteenth century :<sup>1</sup>

Duo pueri [MARIA MAGDALENA] :

Certe multis argumentis vidi signa resurgentis.

sudarium et vestes,
surrexit Christus spes mea, precedet suos in Galilea.

Chorus :

Die nobis Maria, quid vidisti in via ?

[Chorus :]

Duo pueri [MARIA M.] :<sup>3</sup> Sepulchrum Christi viventis et gloriam vidi resurgentis, angelicos testes,

Credendum est magis soli Mariæ veraci quam Judeorum turbæ fallaci ;
scimus Christum surrexisse
ex mortuis vere ;
tu nobis, victor rex, miserere.

Of the second the introductory songs in the plays below, given as Milchsack's fourth group,<sup>4</sup> will serve as examples. Our consideration of these lyrics may well close with Hoffman's 'Ludus de Nocte Pasche,' which I give in full, as showing what parts in the transition the Latin and vernacular tongues held respectively in these plays.<sup>5</sup>

INCIPIT LUDUS DE NOCTE PASCHE.

Prima Maria cantat :

Heu nobis internas mentes<sup>6</sup>
quanti pulsant gemitus
pro nostro consolatore, quo privantur miseri,
quem crudelis Iudeorum morti dedit populus.
Iam percusso heu pastore
oves errant misere, sic magistro discedente
turbantur discipuli atque nos absente eo
dolor tenet nimius.
Sed eamus et ad eius
properemus tumultum, si dileximus viventem,<sup>7</sup> diligamus et mortuum et ungamus corpus eius oleo sanctissimo.

<sup>1</sup> Mone, p. 22.

<sup>2</sup> Compare (p. 26) with the Victimæ Paschali Laudes of the York Missal.

<sup>3</sup> Almost all important MSS. of the liturgical drama are monastic MSS. (Les Mystères, par L. Petit de Julleville, p. 21, referring to M. L. Gautier). Consequently, in those monasteries where women were not permitted to enter, the Maries were represented by boys.

<sup>4</sup> See p. 32.

<sup>5</sup> Hoffmann, 2, 272.

<sup>6</sup> See p. 33.

<sup>7</sup> See pp. 24, 33.

Prima Maria dicit Rhythmum :

Owê, owê der vil grimmigen hant
 Din aller werlde heilant
 An daz krinze hât gehangen.
 Er hât durch den menschen die martel empfangen:
 Owê ir inden, welch ein grôz mort!
 Wie michel und ungehört
 Versteinet inwer herzen sint!
 Ir hât gekriuzeget die mûter als daz kint

Secunda Maria dicit R :

Owê! wie gar irredlichen ez stêt
 Dâ daz vilhe âne hirten gêt:
 Daz mac man wol beschonwen
 An uns drin armen vrouwen.

Tertia Maria dicit :

Swester, wir wellen vor dem tage
 Gên zû unsers meisters grabe,
 Und bestrichen sine wunden almitalle
 Mit tiurer gûter salben.
 Ich hân ein altgesprochen wort
 Von minen eltern dicke gehôrt,
 Daz din triuwe sî allerbest
 Die man nâch dem tôde leist.
 Wære uns nû liep der lip sîn,
 Des solden wir im tûn gûten schîn.

Et in momento procedentes ad sepulchrum, simul cantando Angelis.

Sed eamus unguentum emere, cum quo possimus unguere
 corpus domini sacratum.
 Quis revolvat nobis ab ostio lapidem,<sup>1</sup>
 quem tegere sanctum cernimus sepulchrum ?

Tertia Maria dicit Rhythmum :

Wer will uns von diseme grabe
 Den stein heben herabe ?
 Daz got darumb sî sîn lôn
 Unde helfe in in den obersten trôn.

Tunc Angeli cantant :

Quem queritis, o tremulae mulieres in hoc tumultu plorantes ?<sup>2</sup>

Et primus Angelus dicit R :

Wen sûchet ir dri vrouwen
 Mit jâmer unde mit rouwen
 Also vrû in diseme grabe
 An diseme ôsterlichen tage ?

<sup>1</sup> See p. 34.<sup>2</sup> See p. 34.

Marie simul cantant Angelis:

Iesum Nazarenum crucifixum quærimus.

Tertia Maria dicit R:

Wir süchen Iesum unsern tröst,
Der uns von sünden hat erlöst.

Angeli simul cantant:

Non est hic quem quæritis, sed cito euntes nunciate discipulis eius et Petro quia surrexit Iesus.

Secundus Angelus dicit R:

Er enist niht hie, er ist ûferstanden
Und is zû Galilea gegangen:
Daz saget sinen jungern unde Petro,
Darumbe diu ganze werlde sol wesen vrô.

Et tunc Angeli simul cantant:

Venite<sup>1</sup> et videte locum ubi positus erat dominus, alleluia alleluia!
Sehet in daz grap
Dâ got selber in lac.
Er ist ûferstanden
Und ist zû Galilea gegangen.

Tunc Marie recedendo simul cantant:<sup>2</sup>

Ad monumentum venimus gementes, angelos domini sedentes vidimus et dicentes quia surrexit Iesus.
Wir wâren gegangen zû dem grabe,
Dâ was der stein gehaben herabe.
Dô sprachen zwêne engel klâr
Genzlichen vûrwâr:
Iesus ist erstanden
Von des tôdes banden,
Und sprâchen: saget Petro und den jungern sîn,
Daz er von dem tôde erstanden sî.

This drama continues with the incident of the Savior's appearing as the gardener<sup>3</sup> to Mary, and closes with the Victimæ Paschali.<sup>4</sup>

A most notable fusion of the Latin with the vernacular, in this case Provengal, is given by Wright,<sup>5</sup> the 'Mysterium Fatuarum Virginum.' It is of the twelfth century probably, though judged by Raynouard to be of the eleventh. A comparison of the German and Provengal plays will be profitable. Both begin in Latin. The important and stereotyped expressions in each are in Latin, and in

<sup>1</sup> See p. 37.

<sup>2</sup> See p. 34.

<sup>3</sup> See p. 36.

<sup>4</sup> See p. 36.

<sup>5</sup> Wright, p. xlii and p. 57.

each there is an attempt to translate such sentences for the people. Thus we have in the above, "Quis revolvat nobis ab ostio," etc., followed by "Wer wil uns von diseme grabe," etc.; "Quem quæritis," etc., with "Wen suchet ir dri vrouwen;" while in the second in Christ's speech:

Amen, dico, vos ignosco,
Nam caretis lumine,
Quod qui perdunt procul pergunt
Hujus aule limine.

Alet, chaitivas! alet, malaureas!
A tot jors mais vos so penas livreas.
En enfern ora seret meneias.

In the former there is a feeling that violent lamentation as lacking dignity, and speech of common things, can be expressed in the vulgar tongue; in the second the speech of inferior characters, in this case the merchants and Gabriel, is in the vernacular.

VI.

THE RISE OF THE RESURRECTION PLAY.

We will now return to the liturgy and trace the Resurrection Play, but, as an aid toward the better comprehension of its intimate connection at first with the church service, I will cite somewhat in detail the Easter service<sup>1</sup> as given in the Alemannic liturgy in the service 'In die sacro Resurrectionis Dominicæ,' omitting the first part.

Ad tertium psalmum induit se Levita, qui primam Evangelicam lectionem lecturus est, Stola & Dalmatica, & accedens ad analogium, in quo liber matutinalis est repositus, præcedantque eum tres Conversi, unus portans incensum, alii duo candelabra, & stent iuxta eum. Deinde Diaconus petat benedictionem dicens, inbe Domine, & pronuntians Evangelium secundum Marcum dicens: Lectio S. Evangelii secundum Marcum. In illo tempore Maria Magdalena, eumque dixit, Et reliqua, tunc recedant Conversi ab eo, & incendant omnia lumina. Interim induant illi se, qui debent primum Responsorium cantare, cappis, & incensent principale Altare: venientes autem ad Fratres in superioribus locis debent sedere usque in finem lectionis; Tunc accipiant duo Conversi thuribula ad ipsos, & offerant incensum omnibus, qui sunt in utroque choro. Post lectionem incipiant Angelus Dominicum & Gloria. Similiter faciendum est ad secundam & tertiam lectionem atque Responsorialia. Qui secundam lectionem legit, debet remanere in sola Alba: Similiter qui tertiam legit, faciat, excepto Abbate, qui debet legere in cappa. Tertium vero Responsorium cantent tres Cantores in cappis, quorum duo incensent Altare, ut supra scriptum est. R. Dum transissent, quod post Gloria Patri reincipiendum est. Interim duo Sacerdotes se cappis induunt summentes duo thuribula, & humeraria in capita ponent, intrantes eorum, paulatim euntes versus sepulchrum, voce mediocri cantantes, Quis revolvat nobis lapidem. Quos Diaconus, qui debet esse retro sepulchrum, interroget psallendo, Quem queritis, deinde illi, Iesum Nazarenum. Quibus Diaconus respondet, Non est hic, mox incensent sepulchrum,<sup>1</sup> & dicente Diacono, Ite, nuntiate, vertent se ad eorum remanentes super gradum, & cantent, Surrexit Dominus de sepulchro usque in finem. Finita antiphona Dominus Abbas incipiat Te Deum laudamus in medio ante Altare, moxque campanæ sonentur in angularibus. Cum cantatur Per singulos dies sonentur omnia signa in choro.

<sup>1</sup> Gerbertus, vol. 2, pp. 236, 237.

This was the service of the fourteenth century at St. Blasien in the Black Forest.<sup>2</sup> Martene<sup>3</sup> gives an Easter service in which the actors at the sepulchre are increased to four:

Quorum unus alba indutus acsi ad aliud agendum ingrediatur, atque latenter sepulchri locum adeat: ibique, manu tenens palmam quietus sedeat.

This one personates the angel, while the remaining three represent the three Maries.

The twenty-eight published Plays of the Resurrection Milchsack has exploited so successfully as to leave little work for a successor. He divides them according to development into four groups, of which we will consider in a somewhat condensed form the first and fourth.

To the first-class five plays are assigned—

- A. Einsiedeln play of the twelfth century;
- B. Paris play of the eleventh century;
- C. St. Martial, Limoges, of the eleventh century, forming an introduction to the Mysterium<sup>4</sup> Fatuarum Virginum;
- D. St. Blasien in Schwarzwalde, given above;
- E. Dunstanus, Concordia, published by Martene.

These plays, omitting introductions, can be tabulated as follows:<sup>5</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Mone gives p. 8, a cut of the three Maries censing the sepulchre and the angel; the sketch he found at the beginning of the Good Friday choirsongs in a MS. at Karlsruhe.

<sup>2</sup> Milchsack, p. 24, note.—Milchsack gives a full bibliography of the published Latin liturgical plays.

<sup>3</sup> Milchsack, p. 38.

<sup>4</sup> See p. 27.

<sup>5</sup> Milchsack, p. 38.

| A.  | B.                             | C.  | D.  | E.  |
|---|--------------------------------|---|---|---|
| Einsiedeln I,XII Cent.                                    | Paris,XI Cent.             | St. Martial,XI Cent.  | St. Blasien,XIV Cent.   | Martene,? Cent.   |
|   |                                |   | Quis revolvatnobis lapidem ?quos DIACONUS,qui debet esse retrosepulchrum inter-roget psallendo :Quem quæritis ? |   |
| ANGELUS dicit :   | [ANGELI :]                     | [ANGELUS :]   |   |   |
| Quem quæritisin sepulchro, ochristicolæ ?             | “ 1                            | “   |   | “   |
| MULIERES re-spondent :                                    | [MULIERES :]                   | [MULIERES :]  | deinde ILLI[MULIERES :]  | Quo decantatofine tenus re-spondeant hiTRES [MULIE-RES] uno ore :  |
| Jesum Nazare-num <sup>2</sup> crucifixum,o cœlicola ! | ““cœlicolæ !           | ““cœlicolæ !  | Jesum Nazarenum !   | “   |
| ANGELUS dicit :   | [ANGELI :]                     | [ANGELUS :]   | Quibus DIACONUSrespondet :  | Quibus ILLE :  |
| Non est hic,surrexit sicutprædixerat :                | ““ipse dixit ;         | ““prædixerat :  | Non est hic !   | “surrexit sicutprædixerat :   |
|   |                                |   | Mox incensentsepulchrumet dicenteDIACONO :   |   |
| Ite, nuntiatequia surrexitde sepulchro.               | ite, nuntiatequia surrexit | ite, nuntiatediscipuliseius quiapræcedetvos inGalilæam. | ite, nuntiate.  | ite, nuntiatequia surrexita mortuis.Cuius mis-sionis voce ver-tant se ILLI TRESad chorum di-centes : Alle-luia ! Surrexitdominus ! |

A and B close here; C adds, “Vere surrexit dominus de sepulchro cum gloria. Alleluia !” In D the women return to the choir and there sing, “Surrexit,” etc., and afterwards “Te Deum laudamus,” as given above.<sup>1</sup> In E the people are invited<sup>2</sup> to come and see the place where the Lord was laid. The sepulchre is found to contain grave clothes, which are taken out and shown to the clergy, who forthwith sing "Surrexit," etc. The linen is laid upon the altar, and the Prior begins "Te deum laudamus."

<sup>1</sup> Read ditto marks from left to right.

<sup>2</sup> See p. 27.

An examination of these plays seems to lead irresistibly to one of two conclusions; either they spring from a common source in the liturgy, or they are copies, with modifications, of one original. The three possible sources in the Gospels are:<sup>3</sup>—

Matth. 28. 5-7.

5. Respondens autem angelus dixit mulieribus Nolite timere vos: scio enim quod Iesum qui crucifixus est queritis:

6. Non est hic, surrexit enim sicut dixit: venite et videte locum ubi positus erat dominus.

7. Et cito euntes dicite discipulis eius quia surrexit, et ecce praeceedit vos in Galileam: ibi eum videbitis. Ecce praedixi vobis.

Mark 16. 6-7.

6. Qui [sc. angelus] dicit illis: Nolite expavescere: Iesum queritis Nazarenum crucifixum: surrexit, non est hic: ecce locus ubi posuerunt eum.

7. Sed ite dicite discipulis eius et Petro quia praeceedit vos in Galileam: ibi eum videbitis, sicut dixit vobis.

Luke 24. 5-8.

5. Cum timerent autem et declinarent vultum in terram, dixerunt ad illas: Quid queritis viventem cum mortuis?

6. Non est hic, sed surrexit: recordamini qualiter locutus est vobis, cum adhuc in Galilæa esset.

7. Dicens quia oportet filium hominis tradi in manus hominum peccatorum et crucifigi et die tertia resurgere.

The question now arises as to what part of the service contained the germ of these earliest dramas. Mone<sup>4</sup> believes that they sprang from the responses and antiphons, as the most dramatic portion of the liturgy; Wilken,<sup>5</sup> that they arose from the first part of the Victimæ Paschali with the Responsorium belonging thereto, influenced, however, by the Gospel text. Milchsack,<sup>6</sup> after a close analysis, bases all the plays upon Matthew and Mark. I do not know that it would betoken any unaccountable originality, if some priest, thoroughly familiar with the Gospel passages and with the Victimæ Paschali with its introductory verse and response, should have borne all in mind while shaping the Easter drama. If, as Milchsack<sup>7</sup> thinks, we have here actually the first step in the development of the drama, it is a sufficiently serious departure from the ritual to imply conscious authorship rather than the slow, unconscious modification of an existing custom; and this, as it seems to

<sup>1</sup> See p. 29.

<sup>2</sup> See p. 27.

<sup>3</sup> Milchsack, p. 30.

<sup>4</sup> Mone 1, 5.

<sup>5</sup> Wilken, p. 68 ff.

<sup>6</sup> Milchsack, p. 34.

<sup>7</sup> Milchsack, p. 34.

me, is an additional argument for the author's resting his invention upon all the recognized dramatic elements, suitable for his purpose, in the liturgy. Furthermore, this view is reinforced by the fact that the play did not have a fixed position in the Easter service, as it would have had if developed from one only of the elements of the service. Durandus says, as quoted by Milchsack :<sup>1</sup>

Quidam etiam faciunt [sc. representationem] ad missam, cum dicitur sequentia illa Victimæ paschali, cum dicitur versus Dic nobis et sequentes.

These five earliest plays, to which the one from Utrecht may be added, are found in Germany and France, and the question of independent derivation from the church service, or of a common source in some one earliest drama, becomes a matter of great interest. If, as Milchsack<sup>2</sup> believes, they spring from the New Testament directly, the fact that they rest upon Matthew and Mark, and none of them upon Luke, distinctively argues for a single author. When we consider the many methods of possible dramatic development of the common material, and note the evident agreement, it seems difficult to dispute Milchsack's conclusion<sup>3</sup> that they sprang from one form, the work of one author. These remains are not of the same date. There is no lack of time within which the inmates of one cloister, proud of its author and play, could carry the drama in memory or in MS. in their visits to even distant cloisters. There is, apparently, no valid objection to the theory, however reasonable an independent development may seem to us.

---

VII.

THE DEVELOPED RESURRECTION PLAY.

For comparison with the above plays we will take two plays of Milchsack's fourth group.<sup>4</sup> Evidences that the redactor used Luke are present in these plays, which are the most elaborate of the Latin liturgical plays of the resurrection. This group contains, according to Milchsack's classification, twelve plays. We will compare one of Germany found in a MS. of the thirteenth century, at Einsiedeln—the entire text is accompanied by music notes<sup>5</sup>—and one of France found in the Orleans MS. of the thirteenth century.<sup>6</sup>

---

<sup>1</sup> Milchsack, p. 86.

<sup>2</sup> Milchsack, p. 34.

<sup>3</sup> Milchsack, p. 34.

<sup>4</sup> Milchsack, p. 64.

<sup>5</sup> Mone, vol. 1, pp. 15-19.

<sup>6</sup> Wright, pp. 32-36.

Einsiedeln, XIII century.

IN RESURRECTIONE DOMINI.

*Ad visitandum dominicam sepulturam.*UNA DE MULIERIBUS cantet sola :

Heu nobis, internas mentes!<sup>1</sup>
 quanti pulsant gemitus
 pro nostro consolatore,
 quo privamur misere,
 quem crudelis Indæorum
 morti dedit populus.

ALTERA item sola :

Iam percusso cen pastore,
 oves errant misere :
 sic, magistro decedente,
 turbantur discipuli,
 atque nos, eo absente,
 dolor tenet nimius.

MARIA MAGDALENA :

Sed eamus et ad eius
 properemus tumulum ;
 si dileximus viventem,<sup>2</sup>
 diligamus mortuum.

Orléans, XIII century.

Ad faciendam similitudinem dominici sepulchri primum procedant TRES FRA-TRES, preparati et restiti IN SIMILITUD-INEM TRIUM MARIARUM, pedetentim et, quasi tristes alternantes, hos versus cantantes :

PRIMA carum dicat :

Heu ! pius pastor occidit,
 Quem culpa nulla infecit !
 O res plangenda !

SECUNDA :

Heu ! verus pastor obiit,
 Qui vitam sanctis contulit !
 O mors lugenda !

TERTIA :

Heu ! nequam gens Judaica !
 Quam dira frendens vesania !
 Plebs execranda !

PRIMA :

Cur nece pium impia
 Dampnasti Jhesum invida ?
 O ira nefanda !

SECUNDA :

Quid iustus hic promeruit
 Quod crucifigi debuit ?
 O gens dampnanda !

TERTIA :

Heu, quid agamus, misere,
 Dulci magistro orbatæ !
 Heu ! sois lacrymanda !

PRIMA :

Eamus ergo propere,
 Quod solum quimus facere,
 Mente devota.

SECUNDA :

Condimentis aromatum
 Ungamus corpus sanctissimum :
 Quo pretiosa.

TERTIA :

Nardi vetet commixtio,
 Ne putrescat in tumulo
 Caro beata.

<sup>1</sup> See p. 25.<sup>2</sup> See p. 24.

Einsiedeln, XIII century.

Simul cantent [sc. MARIAE:]

Quis revolvat nobis lapidem ab ostio monumenti?<sup>1</sup>

ANGELUS:

Quem vos quem [quæritis]
flentes?<sup>2</sup>

MULIERES:

Nos Jhesum Christum!

Item ANGELUS:

Non est hic vere!

MULIERES revertentes cantent ad chorum:<sup>3</sup>
Ad monumentum venimus gementes, angelum domini sedentem vidimus et dicentem quia surrexit Jhesus.

Orléans, XIII century.

Cum autem venerint in chorum, cant ad monumentum quasi quærentes et cunctes omnes [sc. MARIAE] simul hunc versum. Sed nequimus hoc patere sine adiutorio; quisnam saxum hoc revolvat ab monumento ostio?

Quibus respondeat ANGELUS, sedens foris ad caput sepulchri, vestitus alba deaurata, mitra tectus caput, et si deinfatus, palmam in sinistra, ramum candelarum plenum tenens in manu dextra, et dicat moderata et admodum gravi voce:

Quem quæritis in sepulchro, o christicolæ!

MULIERES:

Jesum Nazarenum crucifixum, o cœlicola!

Quibus respondeat ANGELUS:

Quid, christicolæ, viventem quæritis cum mortuis?

Non est hic, sed surrexit, prædixit ut discipulis.

Mementote quid iam vobis locutus est
Galilæa,

Quod Christum oportebat pati, atque die tertia

Resurgere cum gloria.

MULIERES converſe ad populum cantent:
Ad monumentum domini venimus gementes, angelum dei sedentem vidimus et dicentem quod surrexit a morte.

Post hæc MARIA MAGDALENA, relietis duabus aliis, accedat ad sepulchrum, in quod sepe aspiciens dicat:

Heu! dolor! heu! quam dira doloris an-gustia!

Quod dilecti sum orbata magistri præsentia;

Heu! quis corpus tam dilectum sustulit
e tumulo?

Deinde pergat velociter ad illos, qui in similitudine Petri et Johannis præstare debent erecti, stansque ante eos quasi

<sup>1</sup> See p. 26.

<sup>2</sup> See p. 26.

<sup>3</sup> See p. 27.

Einsiedeln, XIII century.

Orléans, XIII century.

tristis, dicat [MARIA MAGDALENA:]

Tulerunt Dominum meum,

Et nescio ubi posuerunt eum,

Et monumentum vacuum est inventum,

Et sudarium cum sindone repositum.

Illi autem, hoc audientes, pergant ad sepulcrum ac si currentes, sed junior, sanctus Iohannes, perueniens stet extra sepulchrum; senior vero, sanctus Petrus, sequens eum, statim intret; postquam et Iohannes intret; cum inde eierint, IOHANNES dicat:

Miranda sunt, quæ vidimus!

An furtim sublatus est dominus.

Cui PETRUS:

Imo, ut prædixit vivus,

Surrexit, credo, Dominus.

IOHANNES:

Sed cur liquit in sepulcro

Sudarium cum linteo?

PETRUS:

Ista, quia resurgenti

Non erant necessaria,

Imo resurrectionis

Restant hæc indicia.

Illis autem abeuntibus, accedat MARIA ad sepulcrum et prius dicat:

Heu! dolor! heu! quam dira doloris angustia!

Quod dilecti sum orbata magistri præsentia!

Heu! Quis corpus tam dilectum sustulit e tumulo?

Quam alloquantur DUO ANGELI, sedentes infra sepulcrum, dicentes:

Mulier, quid ploras?

MARIA:

Quia tulerunt dominum meum,

Et nescio ubi posuerunt eum.

ANGELUS:

Noli flere, Maria; surrexit dominus.

Alleluia!

MARIA:

Ardens est cor meum desiderio

Videre dominum meum;

Quæro et non invenio

Ubi posuerunt eum.

Alleluia!

Einsiedeln, XIII century.

Orléans, XIII century.

MULIERES, certantes se ad personam Petri apostoli, omnes cantent :

En angeli aspectum vidimus et responsum eius audivimus, qui testatur dominum vivere ;
sic oportet te, Symon, credere.

MARIA MAGDALENA sola cantet hos tres versus :

Cum venissem ungere mortuum, monumentum inveni vacuum :
heu, nescio locum discernere,
ubi possim magistrum querere.
Dolor crescit, tremunt praeordia de magistri pii absentia, qui sanavit me plenam vitiiis
pulsis a me septem demoniis.
En lapis est vere depositus, qui fuerat in signum positus ;
munierant locum militibus :
locus vacat, illis absentibus.

CHORUS :

Una [autem] sabbati [Maria
Magdalene venit mane, cum adhuc tenebrae essent, ad monumentum, et vidit lapidem sublatum a monumento.]

Mulieres recurrentes iterum ad sepulturam nichil dicant. MARIA MAGDA-LENA querendo circumquaque cantet :
Victimae Paschali<sup>1</sup> etc. usque: Die
nobis.

DOMINICA PERSONA, subito Mariae Magdalene apparens, dicat :<sup>2</sup>

Mulier, quid ploras ? quem quaeris ?

MARIA respondeat :

Domine, si tu sustulisti eum, dicito michi, ubi posuisti eum, quod ego eum tollam. Alleluia ! Alleluia !

DOMINICA PERSONA iterum ad eam :

Maria ! Maria ! Maria !

ILLA providens dicat :

Rabbi ! (quod dicitur, Magister).

Interitu veniat QUIDAM PRAEPARATUS IN SIMILITUDINEM HORTULANI, stansque ad caput sepulchri dicat :<sup>2</sup>

Mulier, quid ploras ? quem quaeris ?

MARIA :

Domine, si tu sustulisti eum, dicito mihi, ubi posuisti eum, et ego eum tollam.

ET ILLE :

Maria !

Atque providens ad pedes eius MARIA
dicat :

Rabboni !

<sup>1</sup> See p. 27.

<sup>2</sup> See p. 27.

Einsiedeln, XIII century.

Orléans, XIII century.

DOMINUS ab ea pavidulum divertens dicit: At ille subtrahat se, et quasi luctum eius deridens, dicit:

Noli me tangere; nondum enim ascendi ad Patrem meum. Alleluia! Alleluia!

Noli me tangere: nondum enim ascendi ad Patrem meum et Patrem vestrum, Dominum meum et Dominum vestrum.

DOMINICA PERSONA stans canet:

Prima quidem suffragia stola tulit carnalia, exhibendo communia
se per nature munia.

MARIA adorans in terra canet:

Sancte deus!

DOMINICA PERSONA:

Hæc (est) priori dissimilis, hæc est incorruptibilis,
quæ dum fuit passibilis,
iam non erit solubilis.

MARIA codem modo quo primus:

Sancte fortis.

DOMINUS iterum ibidem stans dicit:

Ergo noli me tangere,
nec ultra velis plangere,
quem mox in puro sidere cernes ad patrem scandere.

MARIA, ut supra:

Sancte immortalis, miserere nobis!

Item DOMINUS ad eam:

Nunc ignaros huius rei fratres certos reddes mei:
Galileam, dic, ut eant, et me viventem videant.

Sic discedat hortulanus, MARIA vero conversa ad populum dicit:

Congratulamini michi omnes qui diligitis Dominum, quia quem querebam apparuit michi et, dum flerem ad monumentum, vidi Dominum meum. Alleluia! Tunc duo angeli ereant ad ostium sepulchri, ita ut appareant foris, et dicant:

Venite<sup>1</sup> et videte locum, ubi positus erat dominus. Alleluia!

Nolite timere vos;

Vultum tristem iam mutate,

Iesum vivum nuntiate,

Galileam iam adite,

Si placet videre, festinate.

Cito euntes dicite discipulis, quod Surrexit Dominus. Alleluia!

<sup>1</sup> See p. 27.

Einsiedeln, XIII century.

MARIA, reliquis comitantibus, ad chororum sola dicat:

Surrexit enim, sicut [dixit Dominus, præcedit vos in Galileam, alleluia! ibi eum videbitis. Alleluia!]

CHORUS ad eam:

Dic nobis, Maria, [quid vidisti in via?]

IPSA ad chorum:

Sepulchrum Christi cum r. [sc. viventis et gloriam vidi resurgentis;<sup>1</sup>
Angelicos testes, sudarium et vestes;
Surrexit Christus spes mea,
præcedet snos in Galilæa.]

CHORUS:

Credendum est [magis soli Mariæ veraci, quam Iudeorum turbæ fallaci.]
Scimus, Christum [surrexisse a mortuis vere;
tu nobis, victor rex, miserere!]

Item CHORUS:

Currebant duo simul [et ille alius discipulus præcucurrit citius Petro et venit primus ad monumentum].

Interea cum mulieribus PETRUS et IOHANNES currant, et Iohannes præcurrens expectet Petrum, et nichil invenientes revertantur melodiam cantantes:
Ergo die ista exultemus, [qua nobis viam vitæ resurgens patefecit Jesus].
Astra, solum, mare [iocundentur et cuncti gratulentur in cœlis. Spiritales chori trinitati].

Orléans, XIII century.

Tunc MULIERES, discedentes a sepulchro, dicant ad plebem:

Surrexit Dominus de sepulchro.
Qui pro nobis pendit in ligno.
Alleluia!

Hoc facto, expandant [sc. MULIERES] sin-
donem, dicentes ad plebem:

Cernite vos, socii, sunt corporis ista
beati
Linea, quæ vacuo iacere relicta sepul-

Postea ponant sindonem super altare, atque revertentes alternent hos versus.

PRIMA [sc. MARIA MAGDALENA] dicat:
Resurrexit hodie Deus Deorum!

SECUNDA [MARIA JACOBI]:
Frustra signas lapidem, plebs Iudeorum.

TERTIA [MARIA SALOME]:
Iungere iam populo christianorum.

Item PRIMA [MARIA MAGDALENA] dicat:
Resurrexit hodie rex angelorum.

<sup>1</sup> See p. 25.

Einsiedeln, XIII century.

Orléans, XIII century.

SECUNDA [MARIA JACOBI] :

Ducitur de tenebris turba piorum.

TERTIA [MARIA SALOME] :

Reseratur aditus regni eorum !

Interea is, qui ante fuit Hortulanus, in similitudinem DOMINI reniat dalmat-icatus candida dalmatica, candida in-fula infulatus, phylacteria pretiosa in capite, crucem cum labaro in dextra, textum auro paratorium in sinistra habens, et dicat mulieribus :

Nolito timere vos : ito, munciate fratribus meis, ut eant in Galileam : ibi me videbunt, sicut predixi eis.

CHORUS :

Alleluia, resurrexit hodie dominus !

Quo finito, dicant OMNES [MARIE]insimul :

Leo fortis, Christus, filius dei !

CHORUS alta voce :

Te Deum laudamus !

Et CHORUS dicat :

Te Deum laudamus !

We note the following extensions in E and O, as shown by comparison with Group I :

- a. The song during the progress to the tomb. A song, but of very different character, introduces A only in Group I.
- b. Situation of replying angel in O, "foris ad caput sepulchri,"<sup>1</sup> while in D, Group I, "debet esse retro sepulchrum."
- c. In O, "Why do you seek the living among the dead?"—an extension from Luke 24. 5.
- d. In O, the lines beginning, "Mementote," etc.
- e. In E and O, the short song of the women.
- f. In O, the episode of Mary Magdalene's lamentation.
- g. In O, the running of Peter and John, their entering the tomb, and the discussion of the meaning of their discovery. Note that the running in E is out of place and lacks dramatic motive.

<sup>1</sup> The position is significant. In Mont St. Michel it is 'super altare : ' in Rouen, 'ante sepulchrum ; ' in Sens, 'Puer, in vestitu angelico sedens super pulpitu a cornu altaris sinistro.' Therefore in these French plays is recorded the appearance of a stage or platform for the church play.

- h. In O, Mary's return and lamentation.
- i. In O, Mary's seeing the two angels in the tomb and their conversation.
- j. In E, the turning of the women to Peter, and Mary's song in three stanzas.
- k. In E, the use of Victimæ Paschali.
- l. In E and O, the appearance of the Savior to Mary.
- m. In E, the Savior's song.
- n. In O, the angel's invitation to view the sepulchre, the display of linen with, later, the placing of it upon the altar.
- o. In E, the use of the remainder of Victimæ Paschali.
- p. In E, the running of Peter, John, and the women.
- q. The chorus in E, the part song in O.
- r. In O, the return of the Savior to speak to the audience, at which time he speaks the part assigned to the priest in Group I.
- s. In E and O, the close with the Te Deum.

The redactor whose work we have in the Orleans play has sought additional material, portions of points f, g, i, and l, which has greatly improved his play, in St. John, Chap. 20. The author of E has drawn but little from this, the most dramatic account of the incident; he seems, however, to have found p in Luke [24. 12], which may account for its undramatic position in the play.

A comparison of E and O reveals instantly certain characteristic differences. Peter and John's dialogue after entering the tomb, included in g, and Mary Magdalene's conversation with the angels, point i, are wholly lacking in E. The higher dramatic character of O is evident not only in points g and i, since Mary's action in f and h is for dramatic effect. The part song in a, the use of the grave clothes in n, and the return of the Savior in r, all improve the dramatic quality of the play. E as plainly shows a desire for lyrical features. The song in a, e, and especially in j, together with the somewhat cumbersome device for using the two parts of the Victimæ Paschali, sufficiently demonstrate the lyrical tendency. It may be added here that the other French plays of this group agree so closely with O as to argue a common origin, but the German, while not agreeing so closely with E, still show evidently the lyrical drift.

This lyrical tendency becomes more evident if we compare E with the Ludus de Nocte Pasche,<sup>1</sup> into which the vernacular is finding its way. The introductory song is the same, but extended in I, and repeated in part in the vulgar tongue. The two angels who greet the Maries in I are evidently an innovation to render it possible for one to sing in German the substance of the Latin previously sung by the two.

<sup>1</sup> See p. 25.

Furthermore, we note that E and I agree in omitting f, g, i, and l, of O. The divergence of the German plays from the French has evidently taken place, and we have followed the course of the Burial and Resurrection group until we have found the plays on an independent footing, shaping themselves in accordance with the national spirit, and admitting largely the language of the people. We will now turn to our second group, the plays that cluster about the infancy of Jesus.

---

VIII.

THE GENESIS OF CHRISTMAS.

The development of the Christmas plays is so directly dependent upon the genesis of Christmas itself that we must glance once more at the customs of the early church.

The Syrian Gnostics of the third century celebrated the union of God and man as taking place in Jesus at His baptism, which they placed on Jan. 6th.<sup>1</sup> The orthodox adopted this as the feast of baptism, or of the first appearance of the Godhead in man. St. Chrysostom mentions it in the fourth century as an ancient feast in Asia of the manifestation of Christ.<sup>2</sup> This feast was celebrated in Vienna in 360 A. D., and passed into the western church as Christ's manifestation of Himself to the heathen world.

The Feast of the Nativity on Dec. 25th was established in Rome after 350 A. D. by Bishop Liberius,<sup>3</sup> and in the East not earlier than 376 A. D., since Chrysostom said in 386 A. D. that the feast had been known less than ten years. Whether, as Neander thinks, the feast was established in accordance with some apocryphal authority, or, as many think, to supply a counter-attraction to the Roman Saturnalia, may not be susceptible of proof. In any case it became heir to the customs of the Saturnalia, and continued them in unbroken tradition.

In pagan Rome the Saturnalia, because of the confusion arising from the adoption of the Julian calendar, was extended by Augustus to three days, but was often prolonged by the people to seven.<sup>1</sup> On these days presents were sent to friends, the children held holiday, and slaves had the privileges of freemen.

<sup>1</sup> Wilken, p. 1.

<sup>2</sup> Neander, vol. 3, p. 415.

<sup>3</sup> Neander, vol. 3, p. 416.

The Roman church established the Nativity upon the Saturnalia, and within the following week the Feast of St. Stephen, Holy Innocents' Day, and Sunday within the Octave or the first Advent Sunday, which answered to the Roman-heathen New Year, accepting from the Eastern church the feast of the sixth of January for the Adoration by the Magi. This made the whole time from Christmas day until the Octave of Epiphany, the seventh day after the sixth of January, a festival season. That in the minds of the people the pagan tradition was unbroken is proved by the charge of the Manichean Faustus<sup>2</sup> that the Christians celebrated the solstitia with the pagans, and by the complaint of Leo the Great that the Christians still paid obeisance from some lofty eminence to the rising sun.

These festivals passed directly into the church of France—which may, however, have received the feast of Epiphany from the Greeks—but the church of Germany was much slower in adopting them.<sup>3</sup> Advent was not given among the holy times by the synod of Mainz in 813 A. D.,<sup>4</sup> and it seems certain that it was not generally recognized as a church festival until late in the ninth century.

As a result of this later adoption of the religious festivities by the church of Germany, we find an original difference of custom in the French and German churches regarding Christmas, instead of that striking similarity exhibited by the Resurrection plays. With both the plays sprang from the same source, the church ritual, but they held from the first a different relation to the church festival days, and received at an early date the stamp of the national life and customs.

France, like Italy, probably enjoyed from the first an uninterrupted succession of the Roman comedy as performed by jugglers, mimes, and comic actors.<sup>5</sup> The pagan festivities of the Saturnalia were, it would

<sup>1</sup> Neander, vol. 3, p. 419.

<sup>2</sup> Neander, vol. 3, p. 420, quotes Augustine l. 20, c. Faustus.

<sup>3</sup> Neander, vol. 3, p. 420, quotes Leo, p. 26, c. 4.

<sup>4</sup> Weinhold, p. 44.

<sup>5</sup> a. It is said that Louis le Debonnaire (778-840) never laughed when thymelici, surree, mimi, came forward to amuse the people at festivals. — Hase, 210.

b. Thomas Aquinas, Summa ii, 2, qu. 168, art. 3, as referred to by Hase, expounds the office of a player as being serviceable for the enlivenment of men, and as not blameworthy if the players lead an upright life.

c. Sed forte perconteris: fuerunt-ne Sæculis barbaricis inter publicos Ludos Tragædæ, aut saltem Comædiæ? Equidem in remotis Sæculis nullum apertum hujusce rei vestigium hactenus offendi. Post Sæculum vero a Christo nato Undecimum aliquid appear, transported to the colonies in France. At any rate the religious festivities of the holiday season in the Roman church were so closely copied in France as to argue a similar preparation through the existing customs of the people. The rural unformed comedy, continuing among the people simultaneously with these ecclesiastical festivities, naturally drew nearer to them as they became more dramatic in character, and imparted to them color and license wherever entrance could be obtained. This was the easier to accomplish, since both were the expression of joy and gaiety.

It becomes, therefore, less strange that the feast of St. Stephen, which was under the charge of the young deacons, or the Day of the Holy Innocents, which belonged to the choir boys, should more and more incline to the buffoonery of the holiday time until it became the reproach of the church. That these and the custom of the Boy Bishop and the Feast of the Ass were originally devotional in character, and that their degeneration took place through outside influences and in spite of the church, are easy to prove. In the Limoges ritual we find the Feast of the Innocents in the days of its innocence, and the Boy Bishop, when he first appears in the thirteenth century Freising play of the Nativity,<sup>1</sup> is a very proper person.

The course of development of the Feast of the Ass demonstrates from another side the intimate connection of all Mystery plays with the church services, and the impossibility of attributing the rise of every play to any one portion of the service. In the Middle Ages a reputed sermon of St. Augustine formed one of the lessons of Christmas.<sup>2</sup> It was not delivered as a sermon, but declaimed as a species of dramatic chant, and was very popular. It cited all the Old Testament witnesses to the coming of Christ, together with Virgil, the Sibyl, and such others as were believed to have foretold the Savior's advent. It was highly dramatic in form, summoning each witness to give his testimony; thus it was but a step forward when persons differently habited gave the responses. This literary idea found epic expression in the Old English Elene<sup>3</sup> as early as the ninth century, and dramatic form in The Prophets of Christ of the twelfth century, as appended to the Drama of the Foolish Virgins in the

inveni; quamquam in ea opinione sim, nunquam ita excidisse veterum Latinorum Historionicam Artem, ut abolita prorsus fuerit apud Italos ejus memoria atque usus. . . . Arbitror etiam, aliquid inconditæ Comediæ semper fuisse Italis. . . . Muratori Antiquitates, vol. 2, col. 847.

d. Julleville, les Comédiens en France au Moyen Âge, p. 17.

<sup>1</sup> Julleville, vol. 1, p. 42.

<sup>2</sup> Julleville, vol. 1, p. 35.

<sup>3</sup> Cynewulf's Elene, l. 337 ff.

Orleans MS.<sup>1</sup> Among these prophets Balaam is often introduced riding upon his ass, as in the Rouen ritual.<sup>2</sup> Since each prophet gave his testimony, it was easy, by adding adventitious circumstances, to develop his part into a separate scene, and what was more natural than for the ass to speak as in the Bible narrative? Here comedy stepped in, and when the transition from scene to independent play was made, as we see in the Daniel of Hilarius, of the twelfth century, and the Daniel of Beauvais, which joins the vernacular with the Latin tongue, the Feast named from the ass, now become more prominent than its rider Balaam, begins its unsacerdotal course, to the horror of the devout.<sup>3</sup>

We cannot tarry longer on this most interesting subject, except to note that these customs, transported to England by French ecclesiastics, either quickly lost or never acquired the reckless profanity of the French customs. The moral sobriety of the English mind makes it averse to religious frivolity. The Boy Bishop became an illustrious example of the good boy;<sup>4</sup> otherwise Dean Colet would hardly have required the boys of St. Paul's school<sup>5</sup> to attend the ministrations of the child bishop in St. Paul's.<sup>6</sup>

As we turn now to Germany a very different situation unfolds itself. The pagan Roman beliefs never superseded the heathen beliefs of the Teutonic peoples. The early customs of all the families of the Germanic race have proved wonderfully tenacious of life, and the church in Germany found itself obliged to tolerate much, though less in the South than in the North.

During the centuries before the church of Germany adopted the church festival of Christmas, it had accustomed itself to the holiday festivities of the people. The Jul-fire burned in the homes of Germany, Sweden, and Norway like the Yule log in the English home. The Schimmelreiter, on his steed covered with white, a direct descendant of Wodan,<sup>7</sup> rode among the holiday makers, as did his kin of the

<sup>1</sup> Wright, p. 30.

<sup>2</sup> Du Cange, Festum Asinorum: Duo missi a Rege Balee dicant, Balaam, veni et fac. Tunc Balaam ornatus, sedens super asinam (hinc festo nomen), habens calcaria, retinet loram, et calcaribus percutiat asinam, et quidam juvenis, tenens gladium, obstat asinæ. Quidam sub asina dicat: Cur me calcaribus miscram sic luditis!

<sup>3</sup> For the genesis of the 'sottie' and 'sermon joyeux' from the Fête des Fous, see Julléville, Les Comédiens en France au Moyen Âge, p. 32 ff.

<sup>4</sup> That he sometimes died young was proved by the discovery of the monument of a Boy Bishop at Salisbury.—Hone, 196.

<sup>5</sup> In the statutes of St. Paul's school, founded 1512, Dean Colet orders the scholars to "come to Paulis Church and hear the Chylde-Bishop's sermon; and after be at the hygh masse, and each of them offer a penny to the Chylde-Bishop."—Hone, p. 198.

<sup>6</sup> The entire subject of comedy in the early Middle Ages, and its development in the church of France, demands an independent investigation.

<sup>7</sup> Haupt's Zeitschrift, vol. 5, p. 172, art. Wodan, by Kuhn.

hobby-horse in the halls of old England. Many other customs derived from the old faith still held the hearts of the German people, and were incorporated into or modified the later celebration of Christmas. As one result of these customs, the church festivities naturally fell in with the holiday temper of the season, grew rapidly in popularity, and quickly passed more or less into the hands of the people. The Christ-child made the visits from house to house in company with Ruprecht, Frau Mary rocked his cradle in the drama, and Goodman Joseph lent a willing hand.<sup>1</sup>

We cannot stop now to consider the Christmas songs and carols in their bearing upon the drama, or to trace the growth of folk-humor and devil-play within the dramas themselves, all of which bear testimony to the heartiness with which the common people adopted these holiday plays, and the extent to which they made them the vehicle of their own humor and the expression of their rough, hearty good nature. After a similar fashion the York and Woodkirk plays of England embody the folk spirit of Yorkshire. A comparison of plays so kindred in spirit, but wholly unconnected in literary development, would prove an instructive study in racial characteristics.

---

<sup>1</sup> Thus in a play given by Weinhold we read, p. 106:

MARIA :

Ach Joseph lieber, Joseph mein, wiege mir das kleine Kindelein.

JOSEPH :

Kindla wiega, Kindla wiega !
Ích koan nich menne Finger biega !
Hunni sausi,
der Kitsche thut der Bauch wih !

ALLE singen :

Lasst uns das Kindelein wiegen, das in dem Krippelein thut liegen.

O Jesulein süß, o Jesulein süß.

Lasst uns das Kindelein speisen,
Ihm grossen Dank erweisen.

O Jesulein süß, o Jesulein süß.

Gloria in excelsis Deo.

IX.

THE GROWTH OF THE CHRISTMAS CYCLE.

We will now consider, but briefly, since the process of development is similar to that of the Resurrection plays, the growth of the dramas of the star or Magi, and that of the shepherds, within the liturgy of the church itself.

In the first place we note that the signs of their presence are even less evident in the York Missal than were those of the Resurrection Plays. In the service for Epiphany, in the Sequence for the second day, appears the following :

Thure Deum prædicant, auro regem magnum, hominem mortalem myrrha.
In somnis hos monet angelus, ne redeant ad regem commotum propter regna.
Pavebat etenim nimium regem natum, verens amittere regni jura.

For the third day :

Magi sibi stella micante prævia pergunt alacres itinera patriam quæ eos ducebant ad propriam ; linquentes Herodis mandata.

Qui percussus corde nimia præ ira extemplo mandat infantium agmina inquire Bethlehem per confinia, et mox privari eos vita.<sup>1</sup>

These cannot, perhaps, be considered sure traces of the drama, but in the rubrics of MS. D. for Christmas occur these significant words, which are not found elsewhere in the Missal :

Ad Missam in Gallicantu :—

Paratus interim festive Decanus vel Præcentor sen aliquis de majoribus personis procedat ad Altare cum suis Ministris etiam festive indutis. Peractisque ibidem omnibus quæ juxta morem dicenda vel facienda sunt, incipiat Executor officii ad Altare Gloria in excelsis cum nota de angelis.<sup>2</sup>

In die Nativitatis Domini. Ad Magnam Missam. Interim Prælati vel Decanus sive unus de majoribus dignitatibus cum suis Ministris exeat ad Altare. Et peractis omnibus ibidem, quæ peragenda sunt, incipiat Sacerdos orationem.<sup>3</sup>

These comprise, I think, all the passages in the York Missal that have any bearing upon the plays.

We have no means of determining how elaborate these dramas were to which the York Missal refers. As they were kept out of the Missal itself, it is probable that they were re-written, expanded, or otherwise changed, as the fancy of succeeding generations of monks might suggest.

Of the continental plays several specimens are extant, and the literary relations in the Catholic church were, at that time, so close throughout the West, that the plays of one cathedral church did not differ essentially from those of another. That we may see, however, what this difference was, as well as learn something of the character of the plays themselves, I give three extended plays which include the Office of the Shepherds and that of the Magi.

<sup>1</sup> York Missal, p. 32.

<sup>2</sup> York Missal, p. 14.

<sup>3</sup> York Missal, p. 18.

Of these plays, the first, the Rouen Play, still held its place in the service, and was, therefore, acted as two plays, the Office of the Shepherds falling on Christmas day, and that of the Magi on Epiphany (Jan. 6th). The third, the Orleans Play, had passed out of the church, and was played "ad januas monasterii." It shows a fusion of the two plays, as does also that of Freising. The play is no longer a part of the church service; therefore there is no procession, as in the Rouen Play. The excision of the procession suggested a use for the separate play of the Magi; it was inserted in the place of the procession.

The Orleans Play affords us a view of a first step in cyclic formation. But this method of insertion could find but a limited field of operation, since the earliest plays did not dramatize some world-epic, thus affording a framework for numberless insertions, but were illustrative of some single motive contained in the liturgy.

How the Resurrection Cycle was joined to the Christmas Cycle, and how the resulting cycle of Christ's life was, through the aid of the prophecies, extended back to the creation of the world, will be considered in the following chapters.

Our concern, at present, is with the methods employed for combining the Play of the Shepherds with that of the Magi, i. e., with the formation of the Christmas Cycle itself. Here the Freising Play is of value as illustrating the uniform tradition throughout the churches, for it is certain that the Freising is not immediately derived from the Orleans, nor the Orleans from the Freising. Neither was the Freising play formed from the Rouen, though possibly the Orleans play may have been.

These positions are supported by many proofs. The most evident, as regards the Freising, is the absence of the Adoration by the Shepherds. This shepherd episode in F would seem to point to an early liturgical form for model. The angel makes the announcement; the shepherds say, Let us go; the Magi meet them returning, and they announce that they have seen the child. The dramatic situation involved in the adoration is entirely omitted. This is the case also in the Nantes and Laon rituals. }

Elsewhere in the development of dramatic incident, F, R and O do not agree. In the first recognition of the star F agrees with R, and gives a more dramatic form than that of O, since in O the Third Magus is silent. This is one point in evidence that O, if derived from R, must be derived from an older form of R. The kiss of peace is found in O alone. The Herod episodes in F and O show such striking agreement in parts as to preclude the supposition of absolutely independent construction; still there are such transpositions and developments of detail as render it equally incredible that either was taken directly from the other.

It would carry me too far from the direct course of this investigation to trace these developments to their sources, if, indeed, it would prove possible with the material extant. It may be profitable to state briefly the characteristics here presented, and leave it for others to modify the statements through comparison with other plays.<sup>1</sup>

1. The Herod play in F and in O is developed from a common original.

2. The Herod play was introduced to supersede the procession, possibly because the play was taken out of the service in obedience to some reforming impulse, and played, like the Orleans play, "ad januas monasterii."

3. Herod has already his conventional anger and brusqueness, but not his later bombast.

4. The son's part is defined in O, and the action of the scribes in both F and O.

5. F plainly points to the succeeding play of the Slaughter of the Innocents, yet strangely enough puts into the mouth of the soldier in "Discerne, domine," the words of the Interfectio Puerorum of the Orleans MS. instead of those of the Ordo Rachelis, though the Ordo Rachelis appears to belong to the same section as F.

6. The King uses in all three plays, viz: F, Interfectio Puerorum, and Ordo Rachelis, the much-mentioned Sallust tag, "Incendium meum ruina extingnam."

Many minor points of interest will be briefly indicated in the notes accompanying the plays. I cannot refrain, in passing, from the remark that an investigation confined to the steps of development and relationship among the early plays of the Christmas time would probably yield rich results, if all the extant material were at command.

<sup>1</sup> Important agreements with F and O are shown by a play upon the same subject in Carmina Burana, Stuttgart, 1847; cp. Weinhold, p. 57.

THE ROUEN, FREISING AND ORLÉANS
CHRISTMAS PLAYS.

Rouen,<sup>1</sup> XIV Century.

Finito Te Deum laudamus, peragatur Officium Pastorum hoc modo secundum Rothomagensium usum. Præsepe sit paratum retro altare, et imago S. Marice sit in eo posita. In primis QUIDAM PUER ante chorum in excelsis in similitudinem Angeli Nativitatem Domini annuntians ad quinque Canonicos quindecim marcharum et librarum, et ad eorum vicarios de secunda sede, PASTORES intrantes, per magnum ostium chori, per medium chorum transeuntes, tunicis et amictis indutos, hunc versum ita dicens: Nolite timere, ecce enim evangelizo vobis gaudium magnum quod erit omni populo, quia natus est vobis hodie Salvator, qui est Christus Domini, in civitate David. Et hoc vobis signum: invenietis infantem pannis involutum, et positum in præsepio.

Sint PLURES PUERI<sup>6</sup> in rollis Ecclesiæ, quasi Angeli, qui alta voce incipiant: Gloria in excelsis Deo, et in terra pax hominibus bonæ voluntatis.

Hæc audientes PASTORES, ad locum in quo paratum est præsepe, accedant eamantes hunc versum:

Pax in terris,<sup>5</sup> etc.

Quod dum intraverint, DUO PRESBYTERI<sup>9</sup> dalmaticati de majori sede, quasi obstetrices, qui ad præsepe fuerint, dicant: Quem queritis in præsepe, pastores? Dicite.

PASTORES<sup>10</sup> respondeant:

*Salvatorem Christum Dominum;
Infantem pannis involutum,
Secundum sermonem angelicum.*

Freising,<sup>2</sup> X Century.

Ascendant REX et sedeat in solio,<sup>4</sup> audiatur sententiam<sup>5</sup> . . . . . querat consilium, creat edictum ut pereant continuo qui detrahunt ejus imperio.

ANGELUS<sup>6</sup> inquit imprimis:

Pastores, annuntio vobis gaudium magnum.

PASTORES:

Transeamus Bethleem ut videamus hoc verbum.

ANGELUS:

Gloria in excelsis Deo, et in terra pax hominibus bonæ voluntatis.

Orléans,<sup>3</sup> XII Century.

HERODES, SIVE MAGORUM ADORATIO.

Incipit ordo ad representandum Herodem.Parato Herode et cæteris personis,<sup>4</sup> tunc QUIDAM ANGELUS cum multitudine in excelsis appareat.<sup>1</sup> From Du Cange—Pastorum Officium—amplified from Weinhold and Du Méril.<sup>2</sup> From Weinhold and Du Méril.<sup>3</sup> From Wright, p. 23.<sup>4</sup> See discussion of manner of presentation.<sup>5</sup> In many places illegible.Quo viso PASTORES perterriti, salutem annunciet eis, de cæteris adhuc tacentibus:Nolite timere vos, ecce enim evangelizo vobis gaudium magnum, quod erit omni populo, quia natus nobis hodie Salvator Mundi, in civitate David, et hoc vobis signum: invenietis infantem pannis involutum et positum in præsepio, in medio dnum animalium.Et subito OMNIS MULTITUDO<sup>6</sup> cum Angelo dicat:<sup>6</sup> The original actors were boys, as per R.Gloria in excelsis Deo, et in terra pax hominibus bonæ voluntatis. Alleluia! Alleluia!Tunc demum surgentes cantent intra se: Transeamus, etc., et sic procedant usque ad præsepe,<sup>7</sup> quod ad januas monasterii paratum erit:<sup>7</sup> In O, cradle at the monastery gate; in R, behind the altar.Transeamus usque Bethleem, ut videamus hoc Verbum quod factum est, quod fecit Dominus et ostendit nobis.<sup>8</sup> The five stanzas are given by Du Méril, p. 146.Tunc DUE MULIERES<sup>9</sup> custodientes præsepe interrogant pastores, dicentes:<sup>9</sup> Presbyters personated women. At Nantes the Cantor asks the question; at Laon the Cantor and Subcantor.*Quem queritis, pastores, dicite!PASTORES<sup>10</sup> respondeant:Salvatorem Christum dominum;
Infantum pannis involutum, Secundum sermonem angelicum.*<sup>10</sup> Priests at Laon, boys at Nantes, who use the words in which the shepherds reply to the Magi in F. The adoration is omitted at Laon and Nantes.

Rouen, XIV Century.

Item OBSTETRICES cortinaum aperientes.

Puerum demonstrent, dicentes :

Adest hic parvulus cum Maria matre sua, de qua dudum vaticinando Isaias dixerat propheta.

Hic ostendant matrem<sup>1</sup> pueri, dicentes :

Ecce Virgo concipiet et pariet filium, et nunc euntes dicite quia natus est.

Tunc, eo viso, inclinatīs cervicibus adorant Puerum, et salutant, dicentes :

Salve Virgo<sup>2</sup> singularis,<sup>3</sup> etc.

Deinde vertant se ad chorum redeuntes, et dicentes :<sup>4</sup>

Alleluia, Alleluia, jam vere scimus Christum natum in terris: de quo canite omnes, cum Propheta dicentes.

Hor finito, incipiat Missa,<sup>5</sup> et PASTORES regant chorum. Dom. Archiepiscopus, si præsens fuerit, cantet Missam.

This ends the Rouen Pastorum Officium for Christmas.

Officium Regum Trium, secundum usum Rotomag. Die Epiphaniæ, Tertia cantata, tres de majori, sede more Regum induti, et debent esse scripti in tabula.

Ex tribus partibus ante altare conveniant cum suis famulis portantibus Regum oblationes, induti tunicis et amictis.

Et debent esse de secunda sede scripti in tabula ad placitum scriptoris. Ex tribus Regibus MEDIUS ab oriente veniens, stellam cum baculo ostendens, dicat alte :

Stella fulgore nimio rutilat.

SECUNDUS REX a dextra parte respondeat :
Que Regem Regum natum demonstrat.

TERTIUS REX a sinistra parte dicat :
Quem venturum olim prophetie signaverant.

Freising, X Century.

MAGUS PRIMUS :

Stella fulgore nimio rutilat.

SECUNDUS :

Que regem regum natum monstrat.

TERTIUS :

Quem venturum olim prophetie signaverant.

Orléans, XII Century.

MULIERES :

Adest parvulus, cum Maria matre ejus, de quo dudum vaticinando Ysaïas pro-pheta dixerat : Ecce virgo concipiet et pariet filium.

<sup>1</sup> The image of Mary, a special development of R.

Tunc PASTORES procedentes adorent in-fantem dicentes :

Salve rex seculorum !

Postea surgentes iuvitent populum, cir-cumstantes, ad adorandum infantem, dicentes turbis vicinis :<sup>2</sup>

Venite, venite, adoremus Dominum, quia ipse est Salvator noster.

<sup>2</sup> Note the greater prominence given to the Virgin in R.

<sup>3</sup> The two stanzas are given by Du Méril,
p. 150.

<sup>4</sup> Note that the closing of R at this point leads to an important variation.

<sup>5</sup> These words prove that the Office of the Shepherds immediately preceded the Mass of the Day, for which the Introit was Isaiah 9. 6.—Du Méril, p. 150.

Interim magi, prodeuntes<sup>6</sup> quisque de angulo suo, quasi de regione sua, con-veniant ante altare, vel ad ortum stelle, et dum appropinquant PRIMUS dicat :
Stella fulgore nimis rutilat.

<sup>6</sup> In O, the people are watching the cradle when the Magi enter unobserved. The Limoges ritual introduces them with pomp.

SECUNDUS :

Quem venturum olim propheta signaverat.

Tunc stantes collaterales, dicat DEXTER ad medium : Pax tibi frater : et ILLE respondeat : Pax quoque tibi : et oscu-tentur sese : sic medius ad sinistrum, sic sinister ad dextrum. Salutatio cuiusque.

DEXTER ad medium :

Pax tibi, frater !

Rouen, XIV Century.

Freising, X Century.

Tunc MAGI ante altare sese osculantur, et simul caant :

Eamus<sup>1</sup> ergo, et inquiramus eum, offer-entes ei munera : aurum, thus, et mirram.

Hoc finito, CANTOR incipiat Responsorium :

Magi veniunt,<sup>2</sup> etc.

Et moreat processio.<sup>3</sup>

Versus :

Cum natus esset Jesus in Bethleem
Judee, in diebus Herodis regis, ecce Magi ab Oriente venerunt Jerosolymam, dicentes : Ubi est qui natus est ? Cujus stellam vidimus, et venimus adorare Dominum.

Sequatur aliud Responsorium, si nec-esse fuerit :

Interrogabat Magos,<sup>4</sup> etc.

SIMUL caant :

Eamus<sup>1</sup> ergo et inquiramus eum, offer-entes ei munera : aurum, thus, et mirram.

Dicite<sup>5</sup> nobis, O Hierosolymitani cives, ubi est expectatio gentium, noviter natus rex Judeorum, quem signis celes-tibus agnitum venimus adorare !

INTERNUNCIUS<sup>5</sup> currens :

Salve, rex Judeorum !

REX :

Quid rumoris affers ?

INTERNUNCIUS<sup>6</sup> :

Assunt nobis, domine, tres viri ignoti ab oriente venientes, noviter natum regem quandam querentes.

REX :

Que sit causa vere, jamjam citus, impero, quere.

INTERNUNCIUS ad Magos :

Que rerum novitas aut que vos<sup>7</sup> causa subegit

Ignotas temptare vias ? quo tenditis ergo ?

Quod genus ? unde domo ? pacemne huc fertis an arma ?

MAGI :

Chaldei sumus, pacem ferimus,

Regem regum querimus,

Quem natum esse stella indicat

Que fulgore ceteris clarior rutilat.

Processio in navi Ecclesie constituta, stationem faciat.

Orléans, XII Century.

Responsio CUJUSQUE:

Pax quoque tibi!

Tunc ostendant sibi mutuo [stellam]:

Ecce stella! ecce stella! ecce stella!

*Procedente autem stella, sequuntur ipsi precedentem stellam dicentes:*Eamus<sup>1</sup> ergo et inquiramus eum, offer-entes ei munera, aurum, thus, et myr-rham, quia scriptum didicimus: Ador-abunt eum omnes reges, omnes gentes servient ei.*Venientes ad ostium chori, interrogant astantes:*Dicite<sup>2</sup> nobis, O Ierosolimitani cives, ubi est expectatio gentium, ubi est qui natus est rex Judæorum, quem signis celestibus agnitus venimus adorare?<sup>1</sup> Also at Limoges.<sup>2</sup> Given in full by Du Méril, p. 154.<sup>3</sup> F and O insert Herod episode, R the procession. At Limoges the magi lay down their presents and go to the offering.*Quibus visis, Herodes mittat ad eos ARMIGERUM, qui dicat:*Quæ rerum novitas aut quæ vos causa subegitIgnotas temptare vias? quo tenditis ergo?Quod genus? unde domo? pacemne huc fertis an arma?<sup>4</sup> Given by Du Méril, p. 154.<sup>5</sup> F informs the king by a messenger of the approach of the magi; O allows Herod to perceive it for himself.<sup>6</sup> Authors seem to disagree as to position of this. Probably the position in O is the original one.<sup>7</sup> Lines illegible, partly supplied from O.

MAGI:

Chaldæi sumus; pacem ferimus;

Regem regum quarimus,

Quem natum esse stella indicat,

Quæ fulgore cæteris clarior rutilat.

Rouen, XIV Century.*Freising, X Century.INTERNUNCIUS ad regem :

Vive rex in aeternum :

REX :<sup>1</sup>

Quid . . . habesque . . . nunti . . .
vives.

INTERNUNTIUS :

Rex mir . . . regis . . .

. . . vocemus ut eorum sermones au . . .

INTERNUNTIUS ad Magos :

Regia vos mandata vocant, non segniter
ite,

ad regem :

En Magi veniunt et regem regum natum, stella duce, requirunt.

Orléans, XII Century.

ARMIGER reversus salutat regem ; flecto genu dicat :

Vivat rex in aeternum !

HERODES :

Salvet te gratia mea !

ARMIGER :

Adsunt nobis, Domine, tres viri ignoti, ab oriente venientes, novum natum quemdam regem queritantes.

Tunc mittit HERODES oratores vel interpretes suos ad magos, dicens :

Laeti inquisitores, qui sunt inquirete
reges,

Affore quos nostris jam fama revolvit in oris.

INTERPRETES ad Magos :

Principis edictu, reges, præsire veni-mus

Quo sit profectus hic vester et unde profectus ?

MAGI :

Regem quæsitum, duce stella signifi-
catum,

Munere proviso, properamus eum ven-erando.

ORATORES, reversi ad Herodem :

Reges sunt Arabum ; cum trino munere natum

Quærant infantem, quem monstrant sidera regem.

HERODES, mittens Armigerum pro

Magis :

Ante venire jube, quo possim singula
scire,

Qui sunt ? cur veniant ? quo nos ru-more requirant ?

ARMIGER :

Quo mandas citius, rex inclite, profi-cietur.

ARMIGER ad Magos :

Regia vos mandata vocant, non segniter
ite.

ARMIGER, adducens Magos ad Herodem :
En Magi veniunt, et regem natum,
stella duce, requirunt.

Rouen, XIV Century.

Freising, X Century.

REX ad internuntium :

Ante venire jube, quo possim singula scire, qui sint, cur veniant, quo nos ru-more requirant . . . inde . . . aut . . .
dic . . . suavis ex . . .

REX ad Magum primum :

Tu mihi responde stans primus in ordine, fari !

Respondeat PRIMUS :

Impero Chaldeis dominans rex omnibus illis.

Ad Secundum :

Tu, autem, unde es ?

Respondeat SECUNDUS :

Tharsensis regio me rege . . . Zoroastro.

Ad Tertium :

Tute . . . unde es ?

Respondeat TERTIUS :

Me . . . . Arabes, mihi parent usque fideles.

REX :

Regem, quem queritis, natum esse, quo signo didicistis ?

Respondeant :

Illum natum esse didicimus in oriente ;
stella monstravit.

REX :

Ex quo illum regnare creditis, dicite
nobis.

Nunc respondeant :

Hunc regnare fatentes, cum mysticis
muneribus
de terra longinqua adorare venimus.

PRIMUS :<sup>1</sup>

Auro regem.

SECUNDUS :

Thure deum.

TERTIUS :

Mirra mortalem.

REX ad milites :

Vos mei sinistri, accite disertos pagina scribas prophetica.

Orléans, XII Century.

HERODES, ad Magos :

Quæ sit causa viæ ? qui vos ? vel unde venitis ?

Dicite.

MAGI :

Rex est causa viæ : reges sumus ex
Arabitis ;

Huc quærimus Regem regnantibus im-peritantem,

Quem natum mundo lactat Judaica
virgo.

HERODES :

Regem quem quæritis natum esse quo
signo didicistis ?

MAGI :

Illum regnare fatentes.

Cum mysticis muneribus

De terra longinqua adorare venimus

Ternum Deum venerantes tribus cum muneribus.

Tunc ostendant munera : PRIMUS<sup>1</sup> dicat :
Auro regem.

<sup>1</sup> At Limoges given in song with action while advancing through the choir, before the star has been seen.

SECUNDUS :

Thure Deum.

TERTIUS :

Myrrha mortalem.

Tunc HERODES imperat sinistris qui cum eo sedent in habitu juvenili, ut adducant Scribas qui in diversorio parati sunt barbati :

Vos, mei sinistri,

Legisperitos ascite,

Ut discant in prophetis

Quod sentiant ex his.

Rouen, XIV Century.

Freising, X Century.

MILES ad scribas :

Vos legis periti,<sup>1</sup>
ad regem vocati,
cum prophetarum libris
properando venite.

REX, ad scribas :

O vos scribe,
interrogati dicite,
si quid de hoc puero
scriptum habetis in libro.

Respondent SCRIBE :

Vidimus domine in prophetarum libris.
nasci Christum in Bethlehem civitate.
David propheta sic vaticinante.

*Antiphona Bethlehem.*REX<sup>2</sup> ad scribas :

. . . finem spectat prudentia rerum ?
Vadite cum vestris . . . estis !
et projiciat librum.

REX ad procures :

Consilium nobis, Proceres, date laudis, honoris, . . .

ARMIGER<sup>3</sup> ad regem :

Audi que facias, rex, audi pauca sed apta ! mox des dona Magis, ne . . .
morari, ut noviter nato quem querunt rege reperto, rex, per te redeant ut te ipse scias quod adores.

REX ad armigerum :

Abduc externos citius, vasalle, tyrannos.

ARMIGER ad magos :

Regia vos mandata vocant.

Orléans, XII Century.

SINISTRI ad Scribas, et adducant eos cum libris prophetarum :

Vos, legisperiti,<sup>1</sup>

Ad regem vocati,

Cum prophetarum libris

Properando venite.

<sup>1</sup> This incident seems to have been exactly copied from one original.

Postea HERODES interroget Scribas, dicens :

O vos, scribæ,

Interrogati dicite,

Si quid de hoc puero

Scriptum videritis in libro.

Tunc SCRIBÆ diu reuoluant librum, et tandem inuenta quasi prophetica, dicant :
Vidimus, Domine, etc., et ostendentes eum digito regi incredulo tradant librum :

Vidimus, Domine, in prophetarum

Lineis, nasci Christum

In Bethleem Judæ civitate,

David propheta sic vaticinante.

Chorus. Bethleem non est minima, etc.

Tunc HERODES,<sup>2</sup> visa prophetica, furore accensus, projiciat librum : et FILIUS ejus, audito tumultu, procedat pacifica-turus patrem, et stans salutet eum :

<sup>2</sup> Here there is variation again. The wrath is the same, but the wording is different.

Salve, pater inclite,

Salve, rex egregie.

Qui ubique imperas,

Sceptra tenens regia.

HERODES.

Fili amantissime,

Digne laudis munere,

Laudis pompani regie

Tuo gerens nomine,

Rex est natus fortior,

Nobis [que] potentior ;

Vereor ne solio

Nos extrahet regio.

<sup>3</sup> The soldier in F gives the advice upon which the king acts ; in O he acts without advice. The introduction of the son seems to have led the author astray.

Tunc FILIUS despective loquens, afferat se ad vindictam, dicens :

Contra illum regulum,

Contra natum parvulum,

Jube, pater, filium

Hoc inire prælium.

Tunc demum dimittat HERODES Magos ut inquirant de puero, et coram eis spondeat regi nato, dicens :

Rouen, XIV Century.

Dum autem processio narem Ecclesie intrare cæperit, corona ante crucem pendens in modum stelle accendatur, et MAGI stellam ostendentes, ad imaginem sancte Mariæ super altare crucis prius positam cantantes pergant :

Ecce stella in Oriente prævisa<sup>1</sup>
iterum præcedit nos lucida,<sup>2</sup> etc.

Freising, X Century.

Ite, et de puero diligenter investigate, et, invento, redeuntes mihi renunciate, ut ego veniens adorem eum.

MAGI aspicientes stellam canant :

Ecce stella in oriente prævisa<sup>1</sup>
iterum præcedit nos lucida.

MAGI<sup>3</sup> ad pastores :

Pastores, dicite, quidam vidistis ?

PASTORES :

Infantem vidimus pannis involutum.

Hoc finito, duo<sup>5</sup> de majori sede cum Dalmaticis et utraque altaris parte stantes, suaviter respondeant :

Qui sunt hi qui, stella duce, nos ademptes inaudita ferunt ?

MAGI<sup>6</sup> dicunt :

Nos sumus, quos cernitis, reges Tharsis et Arabum et Sabæ, dona ferentes Christo regi nato, domino, quem, stella deducente, adorare venimus.

ANGELUS :<sup>5</sup>

Qui sunt hi qui stella duce, nos ademptes inaudita ferunt ?

MAGI<sup>6</sup> respondeant :

Nos sumus, quos cernitis, reges Tharsis et Arabum et Sabæ, dona ferentes Christo nato, regi domino, quem, stella duce, adorare venimus.

Orléans, XII Century.

Ite, et de puero diligenter investigate,
Et invento, redeuntes michi renunciate,
Ut ego veniens adorem eum.

Magis egredientibus, procedat stella eos, quæ nondum in conspectu Herodis apparuit, quam IPSI sibi mutuo ostendentes, procedant. Quæ visa Herodes et filius minentur eum gladiis.

Ecce ! stella in oriente prævisa<sup>1</sup>

Iterum præcedit nos lucida.

Interim PASTORES, redeuntes a præsepe, veniant gaudentes et cantantes in eundo.
O regem cæli !

Ad quos MAGI :<sup>2</sup>

Quem vidistis ?

PASTORES :

Secundum quod dictum est nobis ab angelo de puero isto, invenimus infan-tem pannis involutum et positum in præsepio, in medio duum animalium.

Postea, pastoribus abeuntibus,<sup>4</sup> MAGI procedant post stellam usque ad præ-sepe, cantantes :

Quæ non prævalent propria magnitudine,
Cælum, terra, atque maria lata capere,

De virgineo natus utero,

Ponitur in præsepio,

Sermo cecinit quem vaticinus :

Stat simul bos et asinus,

Sed oritur stella lucida

Præbitum Domino obsequia,

Quem Balaam ex Judaica

Nasciturum dixerat prosapia.

Haec nostrorum oculos fulgurenti lu-mine perstrinxit lucida,

Et nos ipsos provide ducens ad cuna-bula resplendens fulgida.

Tunc OBSTETRICES<sup>5</sup> videntes, Magos alloquantur :

Qui sunt hii qui, stella duce,

Nos adeuntes inaudita ferunt ?

MAGI :<sup>6</sup>

Nos sumus quos cernitis reges Tharsis et Arabum et Saba, dona ferentes Christo nato, regi Domino, quem, stella ducente, adorare venimus.

<sup>1</sup> Here the procession and Herod episode closing, the three plays agree again.

<sup>2</sup> Given in full by Du Méril, p. 155.

<sup>3</sup> In O the shepherds have an appropriate introduction, in F none.

<sup>4</sup> The introduction of this song is one of many proofs of the higher artistic finish of O.

<sup>5</sup> Presbyters, evidently.

<sup>6</sup> These lines would seem to argue a common dramatic origin.

Rouen, XIV Century.

Tunc DUO DALMATICATI aperientes corti-
nam, dicant :

Ecce, puer adest quem queritis. Jam properate adorare, quia ipse est redemp-tio mundi.

Tunc procidentes REGES ad terram simul,
salutent puerum, ita dicentes :

Salve Princeps sæculorum.

Tunc UNUS a suo famulo aurum acci- piat, et dicat :

Suscipe, rex, aurum.

SECUNDUS Rex ita dicat, et offerat :
Tolle thus, tu vere deus !

TERTIUS ita dicat, et offerat :
Myrrham, signum sepulture.

Interim fiant oblationes a clero et pop- ulo, et dividatur oblatio predictis Canonicis.

Tunc Magis orantibus, et quasi somno sopitis, QUIDAM PUER alba indutus, et quasi Angelus, in pulpito<sup>3</sup> illis dicat
hanc antiphonam :

Impleta sunt omnia quæ Prophetice dicta sunt. Ite ab viam remeantes aliam aliam ne delatores tanti regis puniendi eritis.<sup>4</sup>

Hoc finito, CANTOR incipiat ad introitum
Chori responsorium :

Tria sunt munera.<sup>5</sup>

Versus.<sup>7</sup> Salutis nostræ auctor.

Ad Missam tres Reges Chorum regant,
qui festive content :

Kyrie Fons bonitatis, Alleluia.
Sanctus, et Agnus.

Officium :

Ecce advenit.

Freising, X Century.

OBSTETRICES :

Ecce, puer adest quem queritis. Jam properate et orate quia ipse est redemp-tio mundi.

Intrantes MAGI :

Salve princeps sæculorum.

PRIMUS :<sup>2</sup>

Suscipe, rex, aurum !

SECUNDUS :

Tolle thus, tu vere deus !

TERTIUS :

Mirram, signum sepulture.

ANGELUS ad prostratos magos :

Impleta sunt omnia que prophetice dicta sunt. Ite, viam remeantes aliam, ne delatores tanti regis puniendi sitis.

MAGI redeuntes antiphonam canant :

O regem celi.<sup>6</sup>

INTERNUNCIUS :

In aeternum vive domine !
Magi viam redierunt aliam.

REX prosiluens :

Incendium meum ruina extinguam !<sup>8</sup>

ARMIGER :

Discerne,<sup>9</sup> domine, vindicare iram tuam et stricto mucrone querere jube pueros ;
forte inter occisos occidetur et puer.

REX gladium versans armigero reddit
dicens :

Armiger eximie, pueros fac ense pe-rire !

Orléans, XII Century.

OBSTETRICES ostendentes puerum :

Ecce, puer adest quem queritis. Jam properate et adorate, quia ipse est redemptio mundi.

MAGI :

Salve, rex sæculorum !<sup>1</sup>

Salve, Deus Deorum !

Salve, salus mortuorum !

Tunc procedentes MAGI, adorent Puerum et offerent.

PRIMUS<sup>2</sup> dicat :

Suscipe, rex, aurum, regis signum.

SECUNDUS :

Suscipe myrrham, signum sepulturæ.

TERTIUS :

Suscipe thus, tu vere Deus.

Istis factis, Magi incipiant dormire ibi ante præsepe, donec ANGELUS desuper apparens, moneat in somnis ut redeant in regionem suam per aliam viam :

Impleta sunt omnia quæ propheticæ scripta sunt. Ite viam remeantes aliam, nec delatores tanti regis puniendi eritis.

MAGI erigilantes :

Deo gratias ! surgamus ergo, visione
moniti angelica et, calle mutato, lateant
Herodem quæ vidimus de puero.

Tunc MAGI abeunt per aliam viam,

non vidente Herode, content :

O admirabile commercium !

Creator omnium.

Tunc venientes choro, dicent :

Gaudete, fratres,

Christus nobis natus est,

Deus homo factus est !

Tunc CANTOR incipit :

Te Deum, etc.

<sup>1</sup> Another proof of artistic superiority in O.

<sup>2</sup> An episode common in earlier ritualistic plays, probably the invention of one author there.

<sup>3</sup> A platform necessary as in Sens resurrection play, p. 67.

<sup>4</sup> NOTE.—Then the three kings go through the side aisles out of the church and reënter by the left door into the choir.

<sup>5</sup> Given in full by Du Ménil, p. 152.

<sup>6</sup> The closing of F is evidently a reminiscence of some play of the slaughter of the innocents.

<sup>7</sup> The closing of R shows its affinity to the church service.

* The Sallust tag which occurs also in 'Interfectio Puerorum' and in 'Ordo Rachelis.' Sallust is quoted also in the second journée of Saint Didier, and other classics elsewhere.—Julleville, Les Mystères, vol. 1, p. 261.

<sup>9</sup> Agrees with 'Interfectio Puerorum.'

Here we close the second step of our investigation. We have seen the simple liturgy of the early church grow into an elaborate symbolism, which presented the life and work of Jesus so indirectly that the hearts of men were seldom touched by its teachings. This symbolism the new faith in a daily sacrifice revived, and through it men's hearts were again melted by the tragedy of the cross. In the Western church the desire to view concretely that which had touched the heart so profoundly, led to theatrical representation of the highest dramatic moments of the ritual. Two groups of such moments we have followed down: the first, until we found it passing over to the vernacular, a sure sign of severance from the church offices; the second, until single plays became but scenes or episodes in a more complicated drama, another sign of approaching independence, since such plays could no longer hold their appropriate places in the church calendar.<sup>1</sup>

As these plays conform more and more to the popular taste, the sphere of their influence broadens, and their volume expands. Soon they will supplant the chanson de geste in the affections of the French, and the literati of a nation will express through them the mocking spirit of the Gaul, cutting with its satire the foibles of church and nation.

It is no part of our present plan to seek in these later plays of the continent for testimony concerning mediæval thoughts and manners, nor to examine, except cursorily, into their development or stage-setting. We are nearing the time when the English plays, evidently the outcome of long-established literary traditions, will present themselves fully developed, the most sympathetic exponent of the popular life of England in their day, and will offer to us, in the question of their literary ancestry and relationships what, to my mind, is the most interesting literary problem of the Middle Ages.

Some knowledge, however, of the impress of the national spirit upon the cyclic plays of the continent, as shown in their form and in the manner of their presentation, will give increased significance to many features of the English plays. Accordingly, we turn again to the continental plays to learn how cycles were built up, with something of their content and dependence upon the devices for their presentation. It will be necessary, also, to consider the attitude of the church towards the plays while they remained within the church edifice, as well as after they had passed out from under clerical authority, and to notice in passing the organizations, literary and otherwise, that made them their care.

<sup>1</sup> It must be borne in mind that the simple plays of the church offices held their own until the Reformation, side by side with the expanded plays, and that sometimes clergy and laity were in active competition.

X.

THE STAGE AND THE PLAY IN FRANCE.

In the Orleans and Freising plays we have seen one method of combination by which single and ritual plays formed a continued drama. A related development is connected with the evolution of the stage. In the Mont St. Michel and Sens resurrection plays we are informed that the angel had a station 'super altare,' 'in pulpito.'<sup>1</sup> In the 'Officium Peregrinorum' of Rouen are these words: "Et ita cantantes, ducant eum usque ad tabernaculum in medio navis ecclesie, similitudinem castelli Eman preparatum." In the Orleans play we read as a stage direction: "Parato Herode et ceteris personis," and in the Freising play:<sup>2</sup> "Ascendat rex et sedeat in solio."

From these directions it is evident that all the actors took their assigned positions upon the stage at the opening of the play, and were conventionally absent when not performing their parts. Thus we read in the Orleans play:<sup>3</sup> "Tunc Magi abeuntes per aliam viam, non vidente Herode;" so, in 'Interfectio Puerorum,'<sup>4</sup> "Joseph abiens, non vidente Herode."

The greater number of the actors did not move about the stage, but held fixed stations which were marked out upon the platform<sup>5</sup>—here a throne and palace hall, there the interior of a dwelling—while one or two actors passed from group to group, connecting through their action the different episodes, each of which embodied a single ritual play. These platforms were originally erected in the nave; at Rouen,<sup>6</sup> "in medio navis ecclesie." Upon the platform the stations,<sup>7</sup> at first but slightly marked off, were afterwards defined by upright posts and cross-beams, the platform extending farther down the nave as the stations increased in number. The plays seem often to require an unobstructed view across the stage, which would necessitate stations without sides, and as nearly as possible free from theatrical furniture and scenery.<sup>8</sup>

How these primitive theatrical arrangements were used we learn from certain miracle and mystery plays. In the 'Secundum Miraculum Sancti Nicholai' of the Orleans<sup>9</sup> MS., there is one station, the house of Senex. The action is as follows:

<sup>1</sup> See p. 65.<sup>2</sup> See p. 50.<sup>3</sup> See p. 65.<sup>4</sup> Wright.<sup>5</sup> Ebert, vol. 5, p. 68.<sup>6</sup> Du Cange, Peregrinorum Officium.<sup>7</sup> Cp. Julléville, vol. 1, p. 388.<sup>8</sup> Mone, vol. 2, p. 158.<sup>9</sup> Wright.

The traveling students approach, converse, enter, dine, and go to sleep. Their death is planned and in some way, probably by dumb show, represented. St. Nicholas applies for admission, enters, in dining brings conviction to Senex by his words, prays that the students may be restored to life, and students and all join in the closing 'Te Deum laudamus.'<sup>1</sup>

In the 'Quantum Miraculum Sancti Nicholai,' of the same MS.,<sup>2</sup> the stations have grown to three. On one side Rex Marmorinus sits enthroned, with armed guards; on the other side Rex Getron with wife, son, and attendants; in the centre stands the church of St. Nicholas. The action is carried on principally by messengers, is brief, and illustrates the use of fixed stations.

The attendants salute Rex Marmorinus: "Salve, princeps, salve, rex optime!" The king orders them to go forth, subjugate the world, and slay those resisting them.

Getron with wife, son, and priests goes to the church as to some church festival. At the sight of the guards of Marmorinus, who are carrying out their lord's mandates by an advance upon the church, Getron flees, leaving the boy behind, who is led in triumph by the soldiers to their king, to whom they announce: "Quod jussisti, rex bone, fecimus."

The king ascribes praise to Apollo and inquires of the boy his parentage. This question gives occasion for six quatrains, rhyming in couplets, in which the king affirms: "Deus meus Apollo Deus est," and the boy stoutly maintains: "Deus tuus mendax et malus est."

Meanwhile, Getron's wife, discovering her loss, returns to the church in search for her son, and now bursts forth into lamentations. Her attendants seek to comfort her, and she prays to Nicholas for the return of her son:

Nichola, pater sanctissime,

* * * * *

Fac ut meus redeat filius.

It seems that she then returns home, although the stage direction is lacking, and her husband in four quatrains, rhyming in couplets, advises dependence upon Nicholas. They then arise, go to the church, and she again prays to St. Nicholas. Afterwards they return home, and the table is spread with bread and wine, of which the clergy and beggars partake,—possibly a hint to the lookers-on of the proper treatment of the student actors.

About this time, Rex Marmorinus decides that he is hungry, and calls for food, which his attendants bring. Water also is brought; the king washes his hands, and eats. He is thirsty, and bids the son of Getron bring wine. The boy sighs heavily, the king demands the cause, and emphasizes the impossibility of rescue. Incidentally, the boy states that he has been prisoner a year. Now enters "aliquis in similitudine Nicholai," and leads the boy out of the king's house. This, in spite of the attention centered upon the boy, no one discovers!

A citizen of Getron's dominions, who for unexplained reasons is in hostile territory, asks the lad's name, and runs to Getron with the news:

Gaude, Getron, nec fleas amplius;

Extra fores stat tuus filius.

Nicholai laudat magnalia,

Cujus eum reduxit gratia.

The mother hurries to her son, kisses him repeatedly and praises God and St. Nicholas. The play ends, "Chorus Omnis."

<sup>1</sup> The Salisbury Missal of 1534 has a picture of St. Nicholas, with the children rising from a tub, where their members have been placed in pickle by the inn-keeper.—Hone's Ancient Mysteries, p. 191.

<sup>2</sup> Wright.

Such plays make us conscious of the feeble beginnings from which dramatic art has arisen. This play reads like a children's play for an improvised theater. The playwright succeeds fairly well in the capture, though the absurdity shown in the confidence of the soldiers that such a capture fulfilled such a command is apparently not evident to the author. The child is now in the king's power; how to contrive a reasonable escape would seem a difficult problem, but it does not trouble our dramatist. The boy is reintroduced through his conversation with the king, though this expedient would seem to make his unobserved escape a difficult matter. Not at all; an invisible St. Nicholas enters and sets the boy over the threshold, when he is free to go where he will. The infancy of art alone possesses such resources. Rex Marmorinus does not leave his seat during the play, and Rex Getron simply walks to the church and back. Such simplicity of action requires a narrative play with no complexity of situation and but few leading characters. To such requirements the Bible story readily adapts itself, as we shall now see in the condensed cyclic play found in the earliest extant Italian mystery play, and in one of the thirteenth century in Germany.

---

XI.

THE STAGE AND THE PLAY IN ITALY.

According to Klein the oldest Italian plays,<sup>1</sup> known as "Devotioni," were designed, the first for Maundy Thursday, the second for Good Friday.<sup>2</sup> An analysis may be given as follows:<sup>3</sup>

The scene opens with the meal at the house of Lazarus six days before Easter.<sup>4</sup>

Christ enters as from Jerusalem. Mary, followed by Mary Magdalene and Martha, goes to meet Him, embraces Him, and conjures Him not to return, as the Jews will kill him. Christ answers that He must do the will of His Father, but that she must not be sad, as He will tell her before He goes. They embrace again.

At that the meal is served. Mary remains standing by Christ, saying continually, "My Son, My Son." In the meal Lazarus takes part. At the close Christ calls Mary Magdalene to his side and informs her, while she kneels before Him, that He will go to-day

<sup>1</sup> Dialect old and mixed; Palermo, as referred to by Klein, vol. 4, p. 165. Date in first half of fourteenth century.—Klein, vol. 4, p. 165.

<sup>2</sup> The only Italian representative of this step of development.—Ebert, vol. 5, p. 66. The play not in the liturgy but acted during service.—Ebert, vol. 5, p. 67.

<sup>3</sup> The following abstract follows Klein 4, p. 157 ff., and Ebert in Jahrbuch für Romanische und Englische Literatur 5, p. 58 ff.

<sup>4</sup> Ebert believes that there was a scaffold in the middle aisle, upon which Bethany and the Mount of Olives were located.—Ebert, vol. 5, p. 68; cp. p. 104.

to Jerusalem, where He will suffer the death of the cross. He commends to her care His mother, who will be so deeply troubled. She herself is to keep this news a secret until He is taken.<sup>1</sup> Mary Magdalene promises this, then kisses His feet. He, thereupon, retires and joins the rest of the company, but Mary Magdalene remains. Mary comes to Mary Magdalene and wishes to know what her Son has said, but Mary Magdalene declines to tell. Both, then, go to Christ. Mary would kneel to Him, but is prevented by Him. She asks why He is so sad, and shows great anxiety. Christ now tells her that for the redemption of the world He goes to His death. Mary swoons. Reviving, she bewails her fate. "Call me henceforth no more Mary, since I have lost Thee, my Son!" At the close of the conversation both fall in a swoon. They rise and embrace. Christ then goes to His seat.<sup>2</sup>

Mary kneels to Judas, begging him not to forsake Jesus, if He should fall into the hands of the people.<sup>3</sup> Judas permits her to kneel, and replies ambiguously, "It is not necessary to entreat me more, as I know what I have to do." She then kneels to Peter, who will not permit it, and vows that he will protect Christ against the world. Now go Mary, Mary Magdalene, Martha, and Lazarus to Christ, who embraces His mother, and offers to depart. Mary Magdalene prays that they may accompany Him to the gate of the city, to which Christ assents. They proceed together to Jerusalem. When they reach the gate, Mary declares that she is unwilling to leave her Son. He insists, but promises to send to her the angel Gabriel until John can come. Instantly the angel appears. Mary blesses her Son. Again they swoon. Jesus rises and "steps through another door into Jerusalem." Mary Magdalene and Martha raise and support Mary while she speaks to the people:

O Figlio mio tanto amoroso
O Figlio mio, due se' tu andato ?

* * * * *

Ditemi, o donc, per amore de Dio,
Dov' è andato el Figlio mio ?

She then turns to the angel, and entreats him to tell her all the sorrows of Christ, that through the hearing she may find death. Mary Magdalene entreats Mary to return to Bethany and await John's arrival. Mary beseeches the two sisters not to leave her, kneeling before them. They now return to Bethany, Mary speaking touching words to the women by the way.<sup>4</sup> All enter Bethany together.<sup>5</sup>

Forthwith, the scene of Christ's prayer upon the Mount of Olives begins. He takes with Him Peter, James, and John, commands them to rest but watch, while He goes to pray. He kneels down, takes the cup<sup>6</sup> in His hand, and, lifting up His eyes, prays. He returns to His followers, as in the Bible narrative. The second time, Christ puts a stone under His head and sleeps a little. After the third prayer an angel appears. Christ now wakens the three young men while, according to the stage direction, the armed men prepare to take Him prisoner. Christ goes to the other apostles. The thief-catchers with Judas come. "Quem queritis?" and the following words of Christ are in Latin. The arrest follows. Fastened by a thong, Christ is led away, while all His followers forsake Him.

Here ends the play, but there is little break between this and the 'Devozion' of Good Friday which, beginning when the preacher comes to the passage where Pilate commands that Christ shall be scourged,<sup>7</sup> is as follows :

<sup>1</sup> Note that Jesus informs His mother soon after, and this requirement of secrecy seems to be satisfied by Mary Magdalene's refusal to tell Mary.

<sup>2</sup> The conventional exit. Cp. Julléville, vol. I, p. 389.

<sup>3</sup> One of the most artistic touches in the early dramas.

<sup>4</sup> This consciousness of an audience appears elsewhere in this play, notably where John reminds the women of their sons.

<sup>5</sup> A conventional exit.

<sup>6</sup> The prostrations, kissing, blood, and cup are all liturgical traces.—Ebert, vol. 5, p. 70.

<sup>7</sup> The lesson for the day was Chaps. 18 and 19 of John's Gospel, the nineteenth beginning, "Then Pilate took Jesus and scourged him."—Ebert, vol. 5, p. 67.

Christ enters, stripped for the scourging, with His tormentors, who lead Him through the throng to the assigned spot where the column stands. John stands near Christ. The scourgers strike Him a little reverently, and listen to Christ's words to John, who kneels before Him. He bids John call the Virgin. The men now strike and revile Christ and lead Him away. John asks the people where Mary is. He shows a black garment which he would carry to her, and seeks to rouse feeling by reminding the women of their own sons.<sup>1</sup>

Mary Magdalene now comes from the women's side of the church to the stage<sup>2</sup> and steps before John while she bewails the sad news she has heard. John prays her to accompany him to Mary, as he has not the heart to go alone. Meanwhile Mary appears on the other side and they go to her. She laments when she sees the black garment. Mary Magdalene informs her of Christ's captivity, and invites her to take the garment. Christ now appears bearing His cross, accompanied by a throng of women, to whom He teaches the words of the Bible. Meanwhile, He approaches the spot where Mary, Mary Magdalene, and John stand. Mary hastens to Him to embrace Him. The Jews drive her away. Christ drops His cross. Mary, bemoaning her fate, would take the cross,<sup>3</sup> but the Jews drive her back. She falls fainting, and Christ passes on to Golgotha. Mary revives, seeks for her Son, inquires of the women, then goes with Mary Magdalene and John to the place of execution.

Now the preacher<sup>4</sup> explains the situation, and at a signal from him the Jews nail Christ to the cross and lift it up. Christ speaks, and prays for His enemies. Mary addresses the cross. "Bow down thy branches that thy Creator may find rest."

Inclina li toi rami, o croce alta,
Ed ola [dona] riposo a lo tuo Creatore;
Lo corpo prezioso ja se spianta;
Lasa la tua forza e lo tuo vigore.

Here again the preacher speaks, while the play pauses until he gives the sign, when Christ's speech with the robbers follows. Now the dead<sup>5</sup> arise. Three of these speak to Jesus, declaring that the souls in Hell expect Him, the Patriarchs and Prophets; one has also come to stand by Mary and serve her.

The preacher finds it necessary to explain this. Again at the signal the play goes on. The Virgin prays Mary Magdalene to direct Christ's attention to her, saying that He had spoken to the robbers, but not a word to her.<sup>6</sup> Mary Magdalene complies, and Christ commends His Mother to the care of John, who, kneeling and kissing Mary's feet, strives to comfort her. Mary laments, embraces the cross, and faints.<sup>7</sup>

The preacher takes up his discourse until Jesus cries out, "My God, My God, why hast Thou forsaken me?" Meanwhile, God says to His angels that they must strengthen His Son.<sup>8</sup> The angels prostrate themselves, withdraw and descend.<sup>9</sup> They examine to see which is the Son. Meanwhile, the devil appears and approaches the cross upon the right side. One of the angels now descends fully, to receive the blood of Christ. Jesus thirsts. The Jews hand Him with jokes the vinegar mingled with gall, and He refuses to taste it. Mary bewails the malice of the Jews. Jesus exclaims, "It is finished."

<sup>1</sup> See note 4, p. 70.

<sup>2</sup> The stage is only one location. The action is in different parts of the church.—Klein, vol. 4, p. 164.

<sup>3</sup> So Mary desires to take the cross in the Woodkirk Mysteries. The Towneley Mysteries, p. 212.

<sup>4</sup> Compare the preacher with the expositor in the Chester plays.

<sup>5</sup> See cut, p. 75.

<sup>6</sup> This complaint Mary addresses to Christ in the Coventry Mysteries, p. 322.

<sup>7</sup> Note the author's repeated recourse to this as an expedient for removing Mary temporarily from the action.

<sup>8</sup> Ebert believes there was a scaffold in the choir which represented Heaven, that there was a Hell mouth and a post for scourging, but that some action took place in the aisles of the church.—Ebert, vol. 5, p. 68.

<sup>9</sup> There must have been a stairway from Golgotha to Heaven, or some means for pausing midway.

The preacher again explains. At a sign the devil speaks in humble tone, trying to persuade Christ to resign the world to him and save himself from death. Christ turns from him—"Thou wilt never see me rest until I have driven thee out." The devil speaks louder and more threateningly, promising him the lordship of the world. The lance thrust of Longinus follows, his healing and gratitude. Jesus again speaks, commending His spirit to God, at which the devil throws himself upon the ground.

Again the preacher speaks to the people. Mary and John address the people, bewailing Christ's death. Joseph and Nicodemus enter, and take Christ from the cross. They ask of Mary permission to bury Him. She grants it, but will first embrace Him. This is a touching scene. Joseph stands at Christ's head, Mary Magdalene at His feet. Mary kisses the limbs of Christ, His eyes, cheeks, mouth, sides, and feet, while she speaks touching words to the others or they to her. She shows John the lacerated hands. "These are the holy hands wherewith He blessed all," says John. The angel Gabriel appears to comfort Mary and advise her to permit the burial. Mary grants it with much lamentation. Joseph and Nicodemus carry Christ to the grave, while Mary, John, and Mary Magdalene go down the women's aisle. Mary turns and shows the people the nails of the cross which she carries. Mary Magdalene exhorts them to resist the devil as Jesus had done. Here they enter Jerusalem and the play closes.

XII.

THE STAGE AND THE PLAY IN GERMANY.

The following play is of the thirteenth century.<sup>2</sup> It shows an intermixture of Latin and German, similar to that observed in the Ludus de Nocte Pasche.<sup>3</sup> A comparison of the German and Italian plays will serve to show how widely accepted were the same literary conventions among the writers of mysteries. The fixed stations, the continual presence of the actors, their supposed absence when sitting, the avoidance of any complexity of action, such as the advancement of plot through bye-play; all are common characteristics. In development the German play is evidently the older, since it is still largely in Latin. It also lacks many of the dramatic features of the Italian, adhering closely to the Biblical narrative where the Italian artist strikes out a path of his own.

The following abstract was made from Hoffmann's edition of the play:

Pilate and wife with soldiers take their places, then Herod with his soldiers, then the priests, the merchant and his wife, lastly Mary Magdalene. Afterwards, the 'dominica persona'<sup>1</sup> goes alone to the shore to call Peter and Andrew, and finds them fishing. The Lord says to them, "Follow me; I will make you fishers of men." They reply, "Lord, what thou wishest, we will do." Then the Lord goes to Zaccheus, and a blind man meets him,—"Domine Jesu, fili David, miserere mei." Jesus heals him. He then bids Zaccheus descend from the tree, as he would tarry at his house.<sup>5</sup> Jesus passes on.

<sup>1</sup> Longinus, the centurion, stood by the cross. The Gospel of Nicodemus. [II.] Longinus, the soldier, pierced Christ's side.—The Gospel of Nicodemus. [I.]

<sup>2</sup> Hoffmann, vol. 2, p. 245.

<sup>3</sup> See p. 25; also Hoffmann, vol. 2, p. 272.

<sup>4</sup> Cf. 'Figura' for the Almighty in 'Adam.'

<sup>5</sup> He does not visit Zaccheus, however.

Children strew branches and garments before him, singing Gloria and Laus. Now the Pharisee invites him to dinner. He accepts, and the Pharisee urges his servants to hasten the preparations.<sup>1</sup>

Mary Magdalene<sup>2</sup> sings in Latin of the joys of this world, and seeks the merchant with her girl companions to buy for herself ointment. The merchant offers his wares in Latin. Mary sings a German love song with the chorus:

Scht mich an, junge man,
Lät mich en gevallen.

She now enters the house, and an angel announces to her that Jesus, the Nazarene, who forgives the sins of the people, is dining with Simon. She rises, and again sings her song of the delights of life. "Mundi delectatio dulcis est et grata," etc. A lover enters, whom Mary salutes. They converse, then Mary sings to the girls:

Koufe wir die yarwe dâ,
Die uns machen schoene unde wolgetâne.

She now appeals again to the merchant, who tenders his wares this time in German. The ointment purchased, she again enters the house, and the angel meets her as before, and disappears. She rises once more and repeats her song of the pleasures of the world, then falls asleep, and the angel appearing repeats his song of Jesus who forgives sinners.

Mary awakes and breaks into lamentation: "Heu vita præterita, vita plena malis," etc.

The angel appears and says: "I declare unto you that there is joy in Heaven over one sinner that repenteth."

Mary scorns her secular garb and lays aside her robes, putting on a black garment. The lover and the devil retire.<sup>3</sup> She goes again to the merchant, seeking precious ointment,<sup>4</sup> which the merchant sells her for a talent of gold.

The chorus sings: "Accessit ad pedes."<sup>5</sup>

Mary now enters the house of Simon, and, weeping, approaches Jesus. As she anoints his feet she sings one stanza in Latin, followed by two in German. The Pharisee utters the well-known words, and Judas bewails the waste. Jesus declares the work a good one, addresses to Simon Peter his question about the debtors, asking which of those forgiven would love the more. Peter replies, and Christ announces to Mary the forgiveness of her sins. Mary, at this, retires lamenting:

Awê, awê daz ich ie wart geboren.

Jesus now departs to raise Lazarus and is met by the sisters,<sup>6</sup> wailing for their brother. There is no expansion of the Biblical narrative. The incident closes with "Lazare, veni foras,"<sup>7</sup> after which there is a chant by the clergy.

Judas, meanwhile, hastens to the priests exclaiming, "O Pontifices, o viri magni consilii, Iesum volo nobis tradere." The bargain is struck, the sign is agreed upon, and the Jews follow Judas with swords and lights.

<sup>1</sup> This requires four stations, beginning at the sea-shore. Peter and Andrew apparently follow Christ to the house of the Pharisee. He crosses the boundary and sits down.

<sup>2</sup> Evidently rises from her place and advances to the merchant's station.

<sup>3</sup> It would seem that the lover has been sitting in the house since his first entrance, although he has said nothing. The devil is hard to account for.

<sup>4</sup> It is there supposed that some time has elapsed, and that her precious purchase is exhausted.

<sup>5</sup> An evidence of intimate connection with the service.

<sup>6</sup> Evidently Mary withdrew to join her sister in the Bethany station. Such examples of preparation for future situations are comparatively rare.

<sup>7</sup> Lazarus probably did not appear upon the stage. The symbolic nature of this incident illustrates the intimacy existing between the symbolism of the ritual and the realism of the play. In the six lines given to the scene, three are chanted by the clergy: it is practically a leaf of the church service slipped into the drama, and seems to have satisfied author and audience, although the motived utterance, "Lazare, veni foras," leads to no issue.

Meanwhile, Jesus does 'as is the custom at a feast.<sup>1</sup> Now he takes four disciples, ascends Mount Olivet, and enacts this scene in the words of the Biblical narrative. The Jews appear, and Jesus asks: "Quem quaeritis?" They reply: "Iesum Nazarenum." Jesus replies: "Ego sum," and the crowd falls back. When he is taken, all the apostles except Peter and Judas leave him. Peter forthwith denies him twice. The priests chant appropriate Bible verses. Jesus is led to Pilate, then to Herod who clothes him in white and returns him to Pilate. The action passes on in the fewest words possible till Jesus is led out for scourging,<sup>2</sup> when he is clad in purple and crowned with thorns. Pilate says: "Ecce homo." The Jews cry: "Crucifige, crucifige eum." The dialogue in short Bible verses continues until Pilate washes his hands, and Jesus is led away for crucifixion.

Now Judas comes penitent, weeping, to the priests, who reject him. The devil appears and persuades him to hang himself.<sup>3</sup>

The women follow Jesus, weeping. He is placed upon the cross and the title affixed: "Iesus Nazarenus Rex Iudaeorum." The Jews object, and Pilate answers: "Quod scripsi scripsi."

The Virgin now enters with John and, lamenting, beholds the crucified. "Awê, awê mich hint unde immer nê" begins the lamentation of Mary, so similar to those of earlier date.<sup>4</sup> This is continued in Latin, as, sniting her breast, she addresses the weeping women. She concludes by embracing John and speaking eight lines while holding him in her arms, concluding:

Immolemus intimas
Lacrimorum victimas
Christo morienti.

The direction here reads: "Et per horam quiescat sedendo,"<sup>5</sup> after which she again rises, addresses John, and John replies. Jesus now says, while John supports the Virgin: "Mulier, ecce filius tuus," and to John: "Ecce mater tua."

John and Mary withdraw from the cross.<sup>6</sup> Jesus thirsts, tastes the vinegar and cries, "It is finished." Longinus appears and pierces Christ's side. Jesus cries: "Eli, Eli, lamma sabachthani," and expires. Longinus gives his testimony in Latin and German.

Vere filius Dei erat iste.
Dirre is des wâren Gotes sun, adding,

Er hât zeichen an mir getân
Wan ich min sehen wider hân,<sup>8</sup> while the Jews tarry to see whether Elias will come to help him, and one closes the scene with: "Alios salvos fecit, se ipsum non potest salvum facere."

An epilogue of sixteen German verses closes the play; of these Joseph of Arimathea sings the first eight, and Pilate concludes the song.

<sup>1</sup> Jesus must have returned to the Jerusalem station, adjoining which Mount Olivet was probably situated. This bye-play during the performance of a leading action is very rare in these early plays.

<sup>2</sup> Since the mocking, though brief, is represented, it is probable that the scourging was also.

<sup>3</sup> Compare with the appearance of the devil in the Italian play, p. 71.

<sup>4</sup> In the former play Jesus teaches the women, p. 71.

<sup>5</sup> See p. 21.

<sup>6</sup> This must mean that the play is suspended for a sermon, the priest explaining at once the whole mystery instead of interposing his remarks as in the Italian play.

<sup>7</sup> Does Mary withdraw because of the improbability of her silence during agonizing moments while others carry on the play? In the Italian play she swoons at such moments.

<sup>8</sup> Compare the Italian play, p. 72.

XIII.

THE OUT-DOOR STAGE.

If we compare the above abstracts of action with the following sketch of the open-air stage of the sixteenth century, as found attached to a MS. of the fifteenth century Easter Play,<sup>1</sup> we shall obtain an idea of the use of fixed stations in the developed cycle, sufficiently clear for our purpose.

A. B. C. The three divisions of the the stage.

- |   |   |
|---|---|
| 1. The first door.                        | 11. The house of Annas.                           |
| 2. Hell.                                  | 12. The house of the Last Supper.                 |
| 3. The Garden of Gethsemane.              | 13. The third door.                               |
| 4. Mount Olivet.                          | 14, 15, 16, 17. Graves from which the dead arise. |
| 5. The second door.                       | 18, 19. Crosses of the two thieves.               |
| 6. Herod's palace.                        | 20. Cross of Christ.                              |
| 7. Pilate's palace.                       | 21. The Holy Sepulcher.                           |
| 8. The pillar of scourging.               | 22. Heaven.                                       |
| 9. The pillar upon which stands the cock. |   |
| 10. The house of Caiaphas.                |   |

The three divisions of the stage correspond to the three divisions of the church: the nave, choir, and sanctuary.<sup>2</sup> The action begins in the nave, and passes, station by station, through the choir into the sanctuary. The distribution of stations bears some relation to the sanctity of the division. The cross and Heaven are in the sanctuary, Hell is in the nave. This remoteness of position was not objectionable for the Inferno, as it was customary for the devils to make excursions about the stage and even among the audience. This we see in the Norman play of Adam, York Plays, etc. They even acted as police within boundaries,<sup>3</sup> and the unlucky wight who crossed the line became the prey of the devils, to the amusement of the audience.

In regard to the genesis of the out-door stage for the mystery plays, I cannot agree with Mone,<sup>4</sup> who derives the scaffold from the remains of the Roman amphitheater, then existing in France. This theory, as it seems to me, is founded upon two misconceptions: first, that the German plays were later than the French and borrowed from them; but we have found them of about the same date, and, while slower of development, not by any means servile imitations of the French; secondly, that the French plays were survivals of the Roman, a favorite theory with the French, but now rejected by their most careful writers, except so far as it applies to the early, unformed comedy. On the contrary, the form of the stage, its traditions and customs, point directly to the platform within the church. When the plays were taken out of the church, whether because of clerical prohibition, into which we will look shortly, or because space was too limited for the crowds and the platform, or for other reasons, the stage was simply transplanted, and suffered change no more rapidly than the developing plays demanded.

<sup>1</sup> Mone, vol. 2, p. 156.<sup>2</sup> Cp. Julleville, vol. 1, p. 392.<sup>3</sup> Cp. Julleville, vol. 1, p. 393. At Rouen in 1474, paradise was in the east or sanctuary end of the church.<sup>4</sup> Mone, vol. 2, p. 129.<sup>5</sup> Mone, vol. 2, p. 159.

I am aware that we cannot fully solve the problem of seating such vast audiences<sup>1</sup> so that all could see and hear. It is very possible that all the audience did not have favorable positions. Such conditions have existed at anniversary meetings and foot-ball games without seriously diminishing the audience. Yet a familiar play, upon a platform erected in a public square surrounded by houses whose roofs<sup>2</sup> and windows would furnish a favorable outlook for many, could be seen satisfactorily by thousands.<sup>3</sup>

This stationary platform, often of great size and sometimes of three stories,<sup>4</sup> with Hell beneath and Heaven above, and crowded with persons<sup>5</sup> and paraphernalia, was a distinctive feature of the continental play. To this the English cycles presented a marked contrast. The gild plays of England changed the station of the continental stage into a movable pageant, or platform, and instead of calling the population of a city to the stage, rolled the platform through the streets in orderly succession from audience to audience.

<sup>1</sup> At Reims in 1190, it is said, there were 16,000 spectators.—Julleville, vol. 1, p. 409.

<sup>2</sup> A portion of a house, upon whose roof many people sat as spectators, fell, killing 33 men.—Hoffman, 2, p. 243, referring to Flügel, Geschichte der komischen Literatur, vol. 4, Th. 8, 250.

<sup>3</sup> At Lyons in 1549 one Jean Neyron erected a vast theatre with balconies and boxes, where plays of the Old and New Testaments were acted for two or three years on feast-days and Sundays.—Julleville, vol. 1, p. 357. The French, in the 15th and 16th centuries, built boxes for the aristocratic spectators and placed benches for others, at great expense, which was partly met by entrance fees.—Julleville, vol. 1, pp. 401, 405.

<sup>4</sup> Not immediately over each other necessarily, but with Hell covered over at one end of the platform, and Heaven rising at the other end.—Julleville, vol. 1, p. 388.

<sup>5</sup> A Resurrection Play in the library of Lucerne, MS. date 1494, employed 40 persons; one of Frankfort, date 1498, 265 persons; one of Seurre on the Saône, date 1496, 163 persons.—Mone, vol. 2, p. 123.

Of this movable stage I have found no trace upon the continent, except in the Jew plays of Italy, where, on wagon-stages drawn by oxen, the Jew in effigy was mocked, tormented, and finally burned,<sup>1</sup> and in the representations upon chariots, given by the Basoche in the provinces, but unknown in Paris.<sup>2</sup>

---

XIV.

EVIDENCES OF EARLY ITALIAN AND SPANISH PLAYS.

Such aid as the continental plays, prior to the date of the extant English plays, can give towards the study of the English cycles has, according to my knowledge, been presented; not in its detail, which will serve better as illustration when taken with the English plays, but in the general outline, as showing the trend of development in the various stages of advancement and severance from the church ritual. Our reliance has been almost entirely upon the French and German plays. The notices of the Italian drama, prior to the "Devozioni" that we have outlined, are quickly given.

We hear of Italian plays first in 1244, the records stating that on that date a Passion and Resurrection Play was presented.<sup>3</sup> On Whitsuntide and the two following days, in 1238, according to the chronicle of Julianus, Canon of Cividale, the Passion, Resurrection, Ascension, and Outpouring of the Holy Spirit<sup>4</sup> were acted,<sup>5</sup> forming a cycle of no mean proportions. But already other portions of the Bible narrative, which the church linked with the Advent plays as prophetic or explanatory of Christ's coming, were claiming attention, and six years later, according to the same authority, the Creation of Adam and Eve, the Annunciation, and Birth were played. Thus we find in Italy as early as 1306, in two cycles, probably written in Latin, and surely played under the direction or patronage of the highest clergy, the principal scenes of the future world-cycle that should extend from the Creation of the Angels to the Last Judgment.

It is evident that the mystery plays must have arisen in Italy as in France, although but scanty remains of the liturgical plays are extant; otherwise cyclic dramas so early as 1298 would be impossible of explanation. That they also had a recognized standing in the

<sup>1</sup> Klein, vol. 4, p. 239.    <sup>2</sup> Julleville, Les Comédiens, p. 133.    <sup>3</sup> Ebert, vol. 5, p. 51.

<sup>4</sup> Evidently the Passion, Resurrection, Ascension, were considered as forming a fitting introduction to the Giving of the Holy Spirit of which the celebration was a commemoration.    <sup>5</sup> Ebert, vol. 5, p. 54.

Spanish church as early as the thirteenth century is proved by the code of Alfonso the Tenth, of about 1260, which, while forbidding buffoonery plays, expressly states that "Exhibitions there be, that clergymen may make, such as that of the birth of our Lord Jesus Christ, which shows how the angel came to the shepherds and how he told them that Jesus Christ was born, and, moreover, of his appearance when the Three Kings came to visit him, and of his resurrection, which shows how he was crucified and rose the third day."<sup>1</sup> It adds, however, that these should be in the cities under the eye of the bishop or archbishop, not in the villages, nor to gain money thereby.

But in Spain, through adverse circumstances, the development of the play was arrested, and when at last, in 1496, the early dramatic type for Spain was set by the Representaciones of Enzina,<sup>2</sup> its direct inspiration was the Latin pastoral rather than the liturgical drama.

In Italy, on the contrary, the influences were favorable. Commercial cities and wealthy patrons fostered literature. Monasteries and religious brotherhoods lavished wealth upon their Rappresentazioni, in some respects, it must be confessed, to the injury of the plays, since their prodigal expenditure encouraged spectacular effects to the detriment of dramatic power.

In brief, then, as we turn to the more specific problem of the English plays, we shall look to Spain for little assistance, to Italy for much; but our most important aids will be found in Germany and France. The French church plays furnished the models for the liturgical plays of England. The German plays will afford most instructive illustrations of the gradual intrusion of the Teutonic humor, so evident in the York and Woodkirk Plays.

The universality of tradition in ecclesiastical literature gave rise to uniformity of treatment, and to the choice of similar, oftentimes of the same, literary motives, throughout the Roman church. The result may be monotonous as literature, but is invaluable as supplying a common starting point for national literatures. Upon this material the folk-spirit impressed its individuality. In the changing treatment and interpretation we detect the compelling influence of successive phases of thought. From this vast store-house, as from a quarry, the later generations have selected according to their needs and fashioned according to their taste. Here the students of modern literature stand on common ground, and, viewing each several stream on its divergent course, can take note of each deflection due to a foreign cause, of each break or eddy that betokens the vexation, dubiety, or sudden illumination of the national life that lies at the bottom of, and is faithfully mirrored in, every literature worthy of the name.

<sup>1</sup> Ticknor, vol. I, p. 230.

<sup>2</sup> Ticknor, vol. I, p. 245.

---

XV.

THE ATTITUDE OF THE CLERGY TOWARD THE PLAY. ✓

There still remain for our consideration, before we turn to England, the question of the divorce of the play from the church, and that of the status of the writers of these later plays, whose number is legion and whose prolixity<sup>1</sup> appals the reader.

The writers upon mystery plays agree with great unanimity that the plays were driven out of the churches by the disapproval of the higher clergy. It is stated that the introduction of lay actors, of the vernacular speech, and, above all, of burlesque and comic episodes, scandalized the devout and provoked the prohibitions of popes and councils. It seems to me that the statement is true only in a much narrower sense.

In the first place the plays did not leave the churches,<sup>2</sup> but, in their less developed ritualistic form, remained a part of the service until the Reformation, and indeed in many countries or sections long after. The people delighted in pageants, masques, and shows of every kind, and the church did not yield its right to make the service attractive by tableau, puppet-show, and liturgical drama, although such plays received comment less often than the open-air plays.

If, then, these plays survived in the churches, it must have been understood that the clerical prohibition was not directed against every species of mystery play, for no play within the church could have withstood for centuries the uniform opposition of the higher clergy. A glance at the attitude of the church toward plays before the mystery arose may aid us in understanding the situation, for the Roman church has usually kept in touch with its earlier traditions.

From the beginning of the third century, when Tertullian wrote his De Spectaculis, until the tenth century, the church held consistently a condemnatory attitude. In 610, at the second council of Braga, so in 813, and again in 816, the councils spoke in no uncertain tone. They condemned absolutely the performances of the Histriones, Musici, and Mimi. These continued the traditions of the Roman stage, which had adopted the Greek drama of intrigue, and exhibited realistically what the earlier drama had but insinuated. The Fathers use clear language, and show unmistakably that they condemn these because they teach immorality and all manner of iniquity. Indeed, St. Augustine carefully makes a distinction between the mimes and the comedies and tragedies, "the latter class being at least free from filthy language, while their study is approved by elders in their scheme of liberal education." The plays of the day pandered to the lowest imaginations of man. The classic drama had been relegated to the closet. The attitude of the broader-minded of the clergy—of those who did not consider all mental activity a sinful waste when not devoted to the offices of the church—was a reasonable one, distinguishing between lasciviousness of motive and salutary instruction and diversion by theatrical representation.

<sup>1</sup> The history of Joseph in the 'Viel Testament' fills 7000 verses. Les Actes des Apôtres, par Arnoul et Simon Greban, is given in 61,908 verses. The Mystère de Sainte Marguerite contains 10,000 verses.

<sup>2</sup> Juleville, vol. 1, p. 78.

We have seen<sup>1</sup> that these licentious and comic plays survived until the time of the mystery, and that in France they formed a partial fusion with the sacred drama, giving rise to certain abnormal developments, such as the Feast of the Ass. When, therefore, we find the church condemning certain plays and classes of actors under the names of histriones, joculatores, etc., it is necessary to infer that the same classes of play and actor are meant as aforetime, that their intrusion into the church is reprobated, and that mystery plays that have the taint within them are condemned.

In the northern countries, as in France, the popular festivities of the national holidays continually sought expression within and about the church edifice. The church had made itself the centre of all communal interests, so with the quickening of the national spirit an expression was sought within the walls of the church home. But this brought irreverence and indecorum. The hobby-horse in England, the Schimmelreiter in Germany and other 'monstra lavarum'<sup>2</sup> must keep out of the churches. This will explain various interdicts, and will serve to show how in the Middle Ages many a distinction was made of which we lose sight because our knowledge of their life is vague and general.

<sup>1</sup> See p. 42.

<sup>2</sup> In a MS. of the twelfth century at Strasburg is a drawing of a 'Ludus monstrorum'; it is a puppet-show. For the use of monsters, dragons, giants, etc. in religious processions see Magnin, Histoire des Marionnettes, pp. 61, 66, 213.

The primary cause for the departure of the play from the church must, as it seems to me, be sought for elsewhere. We have studied the gradual expansion within the church of the mystery from the rudimentary play of the ritual to the independent but condensed cyclic play. Either development must stop here or the play must leave the church. The nave could not contain the necessary stage, nor the edifice the audience. Great numbers brought confusion and disorder. As a consequence the play moved out of the church into the churchyard, as shown in the Norman play of Adam, or into the open space about the monastery, as the direction "ad januas monasterii" of the Orleans play<sup>1</sup> indicates.

Other motives, as is usual, emphasized a tendency. The longer play led to the introduction of interludes and comic scenes to relieve the tedium. The development of devil-play put upon the fiends, through the traditional license of devilish behavior, the onus of enlivening the people when wearied by the continued play. Their language might be plain, and to us blasphemous, but it was not lascivious, and often contained a telling moral lesson. If we make allowance for the frank realism of the day, we must accept these plays as devout in nature, with the purpose to instruct the people and promote religion. Therefore the priests could encourage them, take part in them, or write them. They could be made the vehicle for sermons upon morals of which the instances, especially in English plays, are many, and the papal benediction could be sought and given, as was, probably, the case with the Chester plays.<sup>2</sup>

Furthermore, as the commercial spirit grew, the concourse of people at the church on sacred festal days offered facilities for barter, and booths became fairs. These festal days were also the days of the mystery play, and thus in England a connection between play and fair was established; not, as Warton maintains, that the play was fashioned to draw to the fair, but fair and play depended upon the church holy day. No one will doubt but that merchants and monks were shrewd enough to turn both to their advantage, when once the connection was established.

<sup>1</sup> P. 51.

<sup>2</sup> The text of prohibitions is given by D'Ancona, Origini del Teatro in Italia, vol. 1, p. 51. Hoffmann, vol. 2, pp. 241-4; Mone, vol. 2, pp. 367-8; Wright, p. XII, taken from Hoffman. The subject is discussed in Smith's Dict. of Christian Ant. under Theatre, Actor, closing, however, before the rise of the mystery; Prynne's Histrio-Matrix is important for clues, but the author's bias must be borne in mind.

XVI.

THE PUY.

The agencies that took part in the composition and representation of the plays, after they ceased to be liturgical, are many. As has been shown, the church did not take an attitude of opposition unless certain objectionable features were present.<sup>1</sup> Therefore monkish and other religious authors often wrote plays,<sup>2</sup> and even acted leading roles.<sup>3</sup> Again, monasteries often bore the burden of presentation. This was most frequently the case in Italy.<sup>4</sup> The religious brotherhoods<sup>5</sup> that spread over Catholic Europe as early as the twelfth century were oftentimes the promoters of the mystery play. If, as seems probable, the craft guilds had a religious origin,<sup>6</sup> or assumed functions akin to those of religious brotherhoods, their connection with the play is easily understood. Through connection with the craft guilds the Meistersänger of Germany also shared in the developmental history of the drama. Indeed, Mone attributes the downfall of the mystery in Germany—though probably other agencies were more potent—to the prolixity of the Meistersänger plays, involving the introduction of so many actors and so much machinery that the unskilled craft players could not successfully present the action.

In France, the Puy, that shadowy literary academy of the Middle Ages, was the immediate successor of the clergy.<sup>7</sup> These Puy, semi-religious, semi-literary, were very numerous in the West and North of France. During the eleventh and twelfth centuries they were devoted to the service of the Virgin, and the members composed verse in her honor, but in the thirteenth century the influence of the lay members led to a broader literary life, and they cultivated zealously the religious drama. To some Puy the cycle of Notre Dame is attributed. In the Puy d'Arras, it is believed, the comedies of Adam de la Halle were played. These literary societies, about the fifteenth century, turned to other lines of literary activity, to morali<sup>1</sup> In France, the play passed from the hands of the clergy in the twelfth century, but they were interested in it even in the fifteenth century.—Julleville, vol. 1, p. 347.

<sup>2</sup> Julleville gives sketches of the eighteen known authors of French mystery plays. Among these there were nine religious or ecclesiastical authors, one lawyer, one notary, one physician, two valets de chambre, and one princess.—Les Mystères, vol. 1, p. 314 ff.

<sup>3</sup> Julleville, vol. 1, p. 367.

<sup>4</sup> Ebert, vol. 5, p. 56.

<sup>5</sup> Compagnia de Battuti of Treviso established 1261, Ebert, vol. 5, p. 52. Compagnia del Gonfalone of Rome, Hase, p. 18, and Ebert, vol. 5, p. 53. Brethren of St. Luke of Antwerp, artisans, Hase, p. 18.

<sup>6</sup> Wilda, Gildenwesen im Mittelalter; also Gross, Gild-Merchant, p. 175.

<sup>7</sup> Julleville, vol. 1, p. 115 ff.

ties, farces, chansons, chants royaux, etc., the mystery falling to the various societies of confrères of which the Confrères de la Passion, of Paris, was the most famous. The sources and makers of the English plays will be the subject of the following chapters.

---

XVII.

PAGEANTRY IN MEDIAEVAL ENGLAND.

As we enter the English field, we are confronted by a confusion of names that is bewildering. It would seem as though writers classed everything from a wrestling bout to a mystery as a play. Some do not hesitate to affirm that pageant and play were synonymous terms.<sup>1</sup> So little regard has been paid to classification by such writers as Warton, Collier, and Ward, that the student cannot trust their conclusions, but must patiently gather his data for himself at first hand, and classify them as his conception of the mediæval life of England becomes clearer. Gradually he will perceive that society in that day was a great stickler for tradition, that the custom found in a given city in one century probably existed there in but slightly altered form in the next century, that the customs in a given city were many and various, and were, within certain limits, sharply defined and kept separate. England was, indeed, Merrie England in those days, but she went about her amusements as though they were very serious, and usually very thirsty, business.

It would take me too far from my theme to attempt to describe all the shows and plays that formed part of a city's life for even one year. The royal entries, the ridings of different social or religious gilds, the church processions in which the laity took part with their pageants of tableaux, their giants and monsters, the plays in the churches, by the craft gilds, at the entertainment of notables, the setting of the watch, the May-day festivities, etc., if faithfully portrayed for a single city, would fill a thesis, and give a new and valuable picture of civic life. If to this we add the direct literary influence of France upon the nobility and court society of England at a time when England and a large part of France were politically one, the subject of amusements in mediæval England assumes vast proportions and becomes exceedingly intricate. As a result, writers upon this subject have failed to observe distinctions that were clear to the people of that day, and, still further misled by the frequent use of a single favorite name for different species of amusements, have included in their discussion of mystery plays<sup>1</sup> much that was but indirectly related to the matter in hand. It becomes, then, our task to attempt to disentangle some threads, and to segregate the plays of the craft guilds which were presented on movable scaffolds, or pageants, from the multitude of similar but not closely connected phenomena.

---

<sup>1</sup> Collier says that in 1502 pageant was only another name for a play.

I. The Puy and the Gild of Parish Clerks in London.

We have noted in France the rise of the Puy, and its position as a cultivator of the mystery. England at this time contained many French ecclesiastics, and it would not be surprising if we found, there sufficient numbers were congregated, something similar to the French Puy on English soil. The following points of similarity seem to me to establish at least a strong presumption in favor of kinship between the Puy and the Gild of Parish Clerks in London.

These are characteristics of the Puy :

1. Date, the eleventh and twelfth centuries.
2. In the thirteenth century admitted lay members.
3. In the thirteenth century cultivated the mystery.<sup>2</sup>
4. In the fifteenth century abandoned the mystery.
5. Was dedicated to the Virgin.
6. Object, the cultivation of literature, probably music also, and sometimes had philanthropic features.
7. Most numerous in the West and North of France.
8. Often formed of parish clerks with or without lay members.<sup>3</sup>
9. Sometimes given to playing in honor of Saint Nicholas.<sup>4</sup>

These are the characteristics of the Gild of Parish Clerks :

1. Incorporated as a gild by Henry III about 1240.<sup>5</sup>
2. Formed of ecclesiastics and lay members.<sup>6</sup>
3. Object, the cultivation of church music and literature.<sup>6</sup> It had, also, philanthropic features.<sup>6</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Collier, vol. 1, p. 52, considers what was probably a French shepherd play presented before the Queen, a French woman, a mystery play.

<sup>2</sup> The Miracles of Notre Dame in the fourteenth century were the work of a Puy.—Julleville, vol. 1, p. 120.

<sup>3</sup> The Puy de l'Assomption at Douai was formed about 1330 under the name of the Confrérie des Cleres Parisiens, called 'cleres parisiens' because they spoke French.—Julleville, vol. 1, p. 119.

<sup>4</sup> As the Saint Nicholas of Jean Bodel of the Puy d'Arras.—Julleville, La Comedie, p. 27.

<sup>5</sup> Hone, p. 208.

<sup>6</sup> Survey of London, ed. 1842, p. 64.

4. Dedicated to Saint Nicholas.<sup>1</sup>
5. Played stationary plays at Skinner's Well.<sup>2</sup>
6. In 1390 a three days' play at Skinner's Well.<sup>3</sup>
7. In 1409 an eight days' play at Skinner's Well.
8. Plays attended by most of the nobles and gentry of England.
9. In 1554, feast at Guildhall College, with singing, playing, and the next day a great procession.<sup>4</sup>

Among the points to be considered are the following :

I. The social or religious gilds of England are, in general, a century later in origin. Thus, to cite a few illustrations—

1327. Fraternity of Corpus Christi in Skinner's Company in London.<sup>5</sup>
1348. The Gild of Corpus Christi at Coventry.<sup>6</sup>
1358. The Gild of Corpus Christi at Kingston-upon-Hull.<sup>7</sup>
1355. The Gild of St. Mary at Beverly.<sup>8</sup>
1378. The Gild of St. Elene at Beverly.<sup>9</sup>

II. Their plays followed continental, not English, traditions.

- a. They were stationary plays as were all the plays of France.
- b. They continued three and eight days, as did the continental plays.
- c. They were especially patronized by the nobility.

One might venture to say that they were probably in the French language.

III. The most marked discrepancy is that touching the patron saint. On the continent the Virgin seems to have been universally adopted, but the Puys later did not hesitate to write in honor of St. Nicholas, and, finally, after the opening of the fifteenth century, to cultivate profane poetry.

II. The Royal Entry.

Nothing illustrates better the community of custom and literary standards among the nobility of England and France than the ceremonies observed when the King, or a high church or state official, entered a city. Indeed, we need not limit our study to England and France, as the same customs obtained in the Netherlands and in Scotland. Two elements of the royal entry concern us here, the pageants and the 'riding.'

<sup>1</sup> Hone, p. 208.

<sup>2</sup> Survey of London, p. 7; given as 1391, p. 36.

<sup>3</sup> Survey of London, p. 143; given as 1490 by Hone, and 1407 by Pollard.

<sup>4</sup> Strype, vol. 3, chap. 13, p. 121; given as 1651 by Hone.

<sup>5</sup> Herbert, vol. 2, p. 299.

<sup>6</sup> English Gilds, p. 232.

<sup>7</sup> English Gilds, p. 161.

<sup>8</sup> English Gilds, p. 149.

<sup>9</sup> English Gilds, p. 148.

These pageants were originally stationary, mute mysteries, placed upon stages of elaborate construction along the route which the King would take within the city. That these shows should be stationary is reasonable, since in such case the King and his retinue need be detained no longer than they wished. That they should be mute, though usually indulging in pantomimic action, is more strange, but of the fact there is abundant evidence. It will aid us to understand the progress from pure mystery to allegory, if we consider somewhat at length these mute mysteries.

1313. A mute play of the history of Jesus Christ from Nativity to Passion was exhibited at Paris before Edward II and his wife Isabella.<sup>1</sup>

1377. At the coronation of Richard II, a castle was erected by the goldsmiths on Cheapside. Of the pageants exhibited two are described by Herbert.<sup>2</sup>

1420, Dec. 1st. In the entry of Charles VI and Henry V into Paris, a mute mystery, consisting of stationary pageants representing a connected story, the Passion of our Savior, was shown,—a bas-relief of living figures counterfeiting a bas-relief of stone.<sup>3</sup>

1424, Sept. 8th. The pageant at the entry of the Duke of Beaufort into Paris was described by an eye-witness in these words:

“Devant le Chastelet, avoit ung moult bel mystere du Vieil testament, et du Nouvel, que les enfens de Paris firent; et fut fait sans parler ne sans signer, comme ce feussent ymaiges enlevez contre ung mur.”<sup>4</sup>

1430. At the entry of Henry VI into London there were many stationary pageants, some with verses attached and some where personages spoke.<sup>5</sup>

We have passed over a century, recording here and there one of the royal entries. All are alike, stationary, mute, and representations of some portion of the Bible story. I find earlier a curious exception, as though uniformity of custom had not established itself prior to 1300.

1293. To welcome Edward I upon his return from Scotland, the London Gilds held a procession, with what appears to have been moving pageants indicative of trade.<sup>6</sup> But very early in the fourteenth century the type became fixed, and we find little variation until the time of Henry VI.

Before 1430 the pageants had been taken from the Bible story, and were easily recognized by all in their conventionalized form,

<sup>1</sup> Jullerville, vol. 2, p. 188.

<sup>2</sup> Herbert, vol. 2, pp. 217, 221.

<sup>3</sup> Jullerville, vol. 2, p. 189.

<sup>4</sup> Jullerville, vol. 2, p. 190.

<sup>5</sup> Fabian, pp. 603-7.

<sup>6</sup> Herbert, vol. 1, p. 89.

but now we find that other subjects are crowding in, breaking the sequence of the story, and rendering some designation necessary to interpret them to the beholder; for this reason verses were attached.

But when the necessity of choosing a Biblical theme was no longer present, the artist naturally selected some subject that would be complimentary to the high personage in whose honor the pageant was set up. Affixed verses he could not easily read, so the complimentary address to the King arose, or a laudatory conversation was carried on between actors. This is approaching very near to the borders of the spoken drama, but I have found no instance of royal entry where a genuine, spoken drama was acted. Further, it would seem that this development of the pageant arose earlier in England than in France.

1431, Dec. 2. Of the entry of Henry VI of England into Paris this description is given :

“ Depuis le poncelet en tirant vers la seconde porte de la rue Saint Denis avoit personnages, sans parler, de la nativité Notre Dame, de son mariage et de l'adoration des trois Rois, des Innocents<sup>1</sup> et du bonhomme qui semoit son blé.”

1432. Entry of Henry VI into London after his coronation at Paris. Allegorical pageants with verses by Lydgate.<sup>2</sup>

1445. Entry of Queen Margaret into London. Seven pageants with verses by John Lydgate.<sup>3</sup>

1461, Aug. 31. Entry of Louis IX into Paris,—“ y avoit une passion par personnages et sans parler, Dieu estendu en la croix, et les deux larrons a dextre et a sinistre.”<sup>4</sup>

1461, Sept. 20. Entry of Louis IX into Orleans. Twelve pageants, stationary, laborers, moral virtues, David and Goliath,<sup>5</sup> etc.

1498, July 2. Entry of Louis XII into Paris. All the pageants were allegorical except those of the Confrères de la Passion who presented The Trinity, Abraham's Sacrifice, and the Crucifixion.<sup>6</sup>

So, fifty years after London, Paris bows to the popular demand for allegory.

1514, Nov. 6. Entry of Mary of England into Paris.

1515, Feb. 15. Entry of Francis I into Paris.

1517, May 12. Entry of the Queen into Paris. In these three the subjects were allegorical.<sup>6</sup> 1521. Entry of the Emperor, Charles V, into London.

<sup>1</sup> Julleville, vol. 2, p. 191, quoting Enguerrand de Monstrelet.

<sup>2</sup> Fabian, p. 603, fol. 190.

<sup>3</sup> Stow, p. 385.

<sup>4</sup> Julleville, vol. 2, p. 196.

<sup>5</sup> Julleville, vol. 2, p. 201.

<sup>6</sup> Julleville, vol. 2, pp. 205-6.

The London Drapers resolved to have no Midsummer pageant, because there were so many pageants ready standing for the Emperor's coming into London, but they afterwards agreed to renew the old pageants and to establish a new one of the Golden Flees, also to bring out their giant, Lord Moryspys,<sup>1</sup> and to present a morys dance.<sup>2</sup>

This item furnishes us one clue to the absence of plays by the craft guilds of London. The royal entries called for frequent and costly pageants from the gilds. These pageants were preserved, and refurbished when occasion demanded them. A cursory reading of the gild accounts shows that the pageants and ridings were felt as a heavy tax,<sup>3</sup> though a necessary one, and make it reasonable that the gilds, having these pageants on hand, should be reluctant to build movable pageants also for Corpus Christi and other religious or civic festivities. They accordingly used their stationary pageants, as the Drapers did in the Midsummer festival.

1577. Visit of the Prince of Orange to Ghent. Tableaux vivants, allegorical, with address to the Prince.<sup>4</sup>

1578, Jan 18. Entry of Governor-General Matthias into Brussels. Tableaux vivants, allegorical, stationary.<sup>5</sup>

1595. Entry of the Archduke Ernest into Antwerp. Allegorical pageants.<sup>6</sup>

The pageants of these three entries mark the decay of pageantry. After the allegorical and complimentary pageant had established itself, there naturally followed on the part of the artists a straining for striking effects and quaint conceits. All sense of unity was lost, and mysterious or grotesque representations, that would make the vulgar gape, became the fashion. The custom had become absurd, and was out of place in the new life that was stirring the hearts of men. Our latest item knits the old to the new.

1603. Entry of James I into London. Ben Jonson's pageant 50 feet high and 50 feet long, a representation of the city of London, with verses attached.<sup>7</sup>

<sup>1</sup> These giants were a necessary adjunct to a display. They were sometimes stationary, more often movable. Gog-magog and Corinaeus, otherwise called Gog and Magog, now at Guildhall, are relics of the olden time.—Hone, pp. 262-270; also Magnin, p. 61; also Fabyn, p. 603.

<sup>2</sup> Herbert, vol. I, p. 455.

<sup>3</sup> Canterbury, as a halting place en route for the continent, would have suffered a heavy tax for pageantry, but avoided it by entertaining outside the city walls,—in a booth erected for the purpose and stocked with victuals and liquors if the halt were for refreshment, in a monastery if a night's lodging were desired. See Ninth Report of the Royal Commission on Historical MSS.

<sup>4</sup> Motley, vol. 3, p. 235.

<sup>5</sup> Motley, vol. 3, p. 305.

<sup>6</sup> Sharp, a cut of a pageant is given, pp. 24, 25.

<sup>7</sup> Sharp, p. 4.

We close with a description of a royal entry, Queen Margaret's entry into Aberdeen in 1511, as given in Dunbar's 'The Queene's Reception at Aberdeen.'

1. The burgesses ride out to meet her—

And first Hir mett the burgess of the toun, Richelie arrayit as become thame to be,
 Of quhom they chesit four men of renoun,
 In gounes of velvot, young, abill, and lustie,
 To beir the pail of velvet cramasé,
 Above Hir heid, as the custome hes bein.

2. The Procession meets her at the gate.

Ane fair processioum mett hir at the Port,
 In cap of gold and silk, full pleasantlie.

3. In the first streets were many pageants.

Syne at hir Entrie, with many fair disport.
 Ressavit hir on streittis lustilie.

(a) The Salutation.

Qubair first the Salutation honorabilly
 Of the sweitt Virgin, guidlie mycht be seine;
 The sound of menstrallis blowing to the sky.

(b) The Magi; The Three Kings of Culane.

And syne thow gart the Orient Kingis thrie
 Offer to Chryst, with beuying reverence,
 Gold, sence, and mir, with all humilitie,
 Schawand him King with most magnificence.

(c) The Expulsion from Eden.

Syne quhow the Angill, with sword of violence,
 Furth of the joy of Paradice putt clein
 Adame and Eve for innobedience.

(d) The giant Emperor, Bruce.

And syne the Bruce, that evir was bold in stour,
 Thou gart as Roy cum ry-dand under eroun,
 Right awfull, strang, and large of portratour,
 As nobill, dreidfull, michtie campoun.

(e) The Stewarts.

The (nobill Stewarts) syne, of great renoun,
 Thow gart upspring, with branches new and greine,
 So gloriouslie, quhill glaided all the toun.

4. After the pageants twenty-four maidens singing.

The matter is summed up in—

The streittis war all hung with tapestrie,
 Great was the press of peopill dwelt about,
 And pleasant padyheanes playit prattellie.

The connection of the tableaux of pageantry with mediæval painting and sculpture would form an interesting and fruitful investigation, but would carry us too far afield.

For the 'ridings' a word will suffice. As the burghers of Aberdeen met Queen Margaret without the city walls, so selected members of each gild in other cities went out wearing their liveries and bearing their banners,<sup>1</sup> and, riding two and two, escorted the king or other dignitary into the city and over the designated route to the palace where he was to lodge.

The Processions.

The Christian church probably held processions from the first century.<sup>2</sup> These multiplied in the Middle Ages and modified greatly many other customs. Thus the royal riding and the procession simulated each other, and were sometimes combined especially in England in the Procession of St. George.<sup>3</sup> Indeed, in many places this ceremony was known as 'Riding the George.'<sup>4</sup> Many processions after the thirteenth century contained one or more pageants. These were carried on moving pageant wagons, but sometimes, in place of the pageant, groups<sup>5</sup> afoot personated characters. Of moving pageants the best illustrations are afforded by the Lord Mayor's Show in London. Thus, the pageant of the Assumption was borne before the new Lord Mayor from the Tower to Guildhall,<sup>6</sup> and later, when allegorical devices were in vogue, many elaborate pageants were devised, of which the descriptions have been preserved.<sup>7</sup> Of those where individuals walking personated characters, we notice the Whit-Monday procession at Leicester, where the Virgin Mary was carried as a pageant and the twelve apostles walked,<sup>8</sup> and the pageant groups at Aberdeen.<sup>9</sup> The pageantry was sometimes very elaborate, as at Dublin in the Procession of St. George,<sup>10</sup> which presented the Emperor and Empress attended by two doctors, two knights and two maidens; St. George who received three shillings <sup>1</sup> Herbert. (a) The gilds of London bore banners of trade at the coronation of Henry IV, 1399, vol. 1, p. 90.

(b) The order of gilds of London in royal entries, vol. 1, pp. 101-2.

(c) A cut of the procession, vol. 1, p. 129.

(d) The citizens of London met the king at Blackheath, vol. 1, p. 91.

<sup>2</sup> The procession was greatly developed by St. John Chrysostom.

<sup>3</sup> The Gild of St. George, Norwich, had a pageant with a 'riding' in procession.—English Gilds, p. 447.

<sup>4</sup> As at Leicester, Kelly, p. 38.

<sup>5</sup> These groups oftentimes contained beasts of wondrous shape, formed of hoops and canvas or wicker-work.

<sup>6</sup> Herbert, vol. 1, p. 457.

<sup>7</sup> There are in print thirteen pageants of the Drapers, eleven of the Grocers, and many produced by the other companies during the years from 1588-1691. They bear the names of Thomas Middleton, Thomas Jordan, Thomas Heywood, etc., as authors.—Herbert, pp. 334, 459-61.

<sup>8</sup> Kelly, p. 7.

<sup>9</sup> See p. 98.

<sup>10</sup> Hist. of Dublin, vol. 1, p. 109.

four pence for his labor; standard, pole-ax, and swords for the Emperor and St. George; then a maiden who led the dragon by a golden line; four trumpets; the King and Queen of Dele, accompanied by two knights and two maidens in black.<sup>1</sup>

III. The Corpus Christi Procession.

The most splendid of all the church processions was the Procession of Corpus Christi, out of which grew in many cases<sup>2</sup> the craft-gild plays. The church fast of Corpus Christi was instituted by Pope Urban IV about the middle of the thirteenth century, 1264, and appointed for the first Thursday after Trinity Sunday. It was endorsed by the Council of Vienne in 1318, and was soon celebrated with great pomp throughout Western Europe. Its office consisted of hymns, anthems, responses, etc., taken from the figurative portions of the Old Testament, and selected, or, at least, digested into form by Thomas Aquinas. From the first the leading feature of the celebration was the procession of the ecclesiastics and laity, in which all civic bodies took part, with tapers, banners, shields of the gilds, and after a time with pageant-tableaux and individuals personating characters at first Biblical, later oftentimes legendary. In the procession the lay societies preceded the host, which was followed by the ecclesiastics.<sup>3</sup> The position next to the host was the place of honor, and we read of many disputes among the gilds about their relative positions.<sup>4</sup> This order of the gilds is a matter of importance to us, as the earliest order of the gilds in the craft-gild plays was doubtless the same as in the procession. Thus in many towns the Mercers, as the most powerful gild, marched next the host—so in York and Coventry—and the Mercers stand last in the York plays.

<sup>1</sup> The Gild of St. Elene at Beverly, founded 1378, carried a youth clad as St. Elene. An old man preceded him carrying a cross, and one followed bearing a shovel. The Gild of St. Mary at Beverly, founded 1355, carried in procession on the feast of the Purification a pageant of the Virgin with what seemed a son in her arms. Joseph and Simeon accompanied her, with two angels carrying a candle-bearer of twenty-four lights.—English Gilds, pp. 148, 149.

<sup>2</sup> At York and Coventry, the Chester plays were connected with the Whit-Monday procession.

<sup>3</sup> Sharp, p. 165. The order was, however, reversed at York.—Davies, York Records of the XVth century, p. 247; also in Skinner's Procession, p. 69.

<sup>4</sup> 1538, June 21. In records of Aberdeen complaint of hammermen that others usurp their place in the Corpus Christi procession.—Records of Aberdeen, p. 452.

1554. Another complaint by the same. p. 457.

See the quarrel between the Weavers and Cordwainers of York. The Cordwainers refused to march on the left of the Weavers. This difference was a matter of some years' standing, and the Cordwainers submitted only under the pressure of a heavy fine and the threatened interference of the king.—Davies, pp. 250-7.

At first, presence in the procession may have been considered evidence of acceptance of the dogma of transubstantiation,<sup>1</sup> to which, as we have seen, the rise of the liturgical play was due;<sup>2</sup> but later the spontaneous expressions of piety did not satisfy the desire for a splendid procession. Accordingly in the fourteenth century the Gilds of Corpus Christi arose, which took the procession under their special care. These gilds did not usually foster plays, and were indeed in some cases necessary to preserve the splendor of the procession after the popular interest had turned from the procession to the plays.<sup>3</sup>

How early pageant-tableaux were introduced it is impossible at present to state,<sup>4</sup> but it must have been at an early date and in close connection with the royal entry. The body of Christ received in a sense royal honors, and it may be that at first stationary pageants, a marked tribute to royalty, were sometimes used. It seems evident that movable pageants were carried by the gild in connection with the gild banner, and usually bore the insignia or arms of the gild; also that at first they presented a connected Biblical story, but afterwards passed through nearly the same developmental stages as did the pageants of the royal entry. These changes, like those of the royal entry, were in the main the same throughout Western Europe, although the intrusion of the civic element doubtless contributed to local variations. The records do not enable us to trace these changes so clearly as in the royal entry, but certain evidences are found.

1437. The village of Draguignan gave a florin to the manager of the procession, "A cause du jeu que chaque année il a contume de faire à faire à la fête du corps du Christ, et qu'il ne peut faire sans aucun subside."

Similar entries in the records of the village occur until 1558, May 8, when the following explanatory note is found:

"Le dit jeu jora avec la procession comme auparavant et le plus d'istoeres et plus brièves que puront estre seront et se dira tout en cheminant sans ce que personne du jeu s'aresté pour éviter prolixité et confusion tant de ladite procession que jeu et que les estrangiers le voient aisement."<sup>5</sup>

This attempt to talk while walking could hardly have been a success. The spoken play was probably oratorical rather than dramatic. These so-called plays were maintained until 1615. There are records of similar exhibitions at Bethune from 1544. In the 'remonstrance' of 1549 there is a list of the tableaux, showing the participation of

<sup>1</sup> English Gilds, p. LXXXV.

<sup>2</sup> See p. 13.

<sup>3</sup> As at York, though so great was the passion for plays that the Gild presented one, the Creed play, once in ten years.

<sup>4</sup> Davies, p. 228.

<sup>5</sup> Julleville, vol. 2, p. 209.

the trades, and furnishing conclusive evidence that these were not spoken plays, but mute, whether with or without action I cannot determine.<sup>1</sup>

Early in the fourteenth century gilds of Corpus Christi began to rise in England. The fraternity of Corpus Christi of the Skinners of London dates from 1327.

"This fraternity had also once every year, on Corpus Christi day afternoon, a procession which passed through the principal streets of the city, wherein was borne more than one hundred torches of wax (costly garnished) burning light, and above two hundred clerks and priests, in surplices and capes, singing. After the which were the sheriff's servants, the clerks of the compters, chaplains for the sheriffs, the mayor's sergeants, the counsel of the city, the mayor and aldermen in scarlet, and then the Skinners in their best liveries."<sup>2</sup>

1348. The Gild of Corpus Christi at Coventry was instituted. It was to carry eight torches about the body of Christ in procession.<sup>3</sup>

1349-50. The Gild of Corpus Christi of Leicester, which contributed to the most splendid procession in the city except that of St. George.<sup>4</sup>

1408. The Gild of Corpus Christi at York, which, after the separation of procession and plays in 1426, became responsible for the procession.

Before 1349. The Gild of Corpus Christi at Cambridge, which held a procession with pixies and shields until 1335, when Dr. Leigh, deputy to Lord Cromwell, ordered it abrogated.<sup>5</sup>

As at York so at Coventry, it became necessary to separate the procession from the plays. At York this was done by appointing the vigil of Corpus Christi<sup>6</sup> for the plays; at Coventry by bringing the procession early in the morning.<sup>7</sup>

It seems, then, that shortly after the confirmation of Corpus Christi in 1311 pageants of the Biblical story were introduced in conjunction with the banners of the crafts. These at first were mute mysteries expressed by action. In a short time, however, spoken drama, found also in isolated cases in France, became an established custom in England. A spoken drama necessitated frequent halts by the procession, as it was impossible to act satisfactorily in motion. Indeed, connected pantomimic action would seem impossible in a moving procession; therefore this custom may be older than the spoken drama. These halts prolonged the procession beyond reasonable limit, and were avoided by transferring the pageants to the rear of the procession. A division of the procession immediately arose through the slower movement of the pageants, but the plays, though much belated, followed the traditional course

<sup>1</sup> Cp. p. 98.

<sup>2</sup> Survey of London, p. 87.

<sup>3</sup> English Gilds, p. 232.

<sup>4</sup> Kelly, p. 36.

<sup>5</sup> Masters, p. 80.

<sup>6</sup> The citizens, however, continued to hold their plays on Corpus Christi day, and the clergy were compelled to postpone the procession until the morrow.—Davies, p. 214.

<sup>7</sup> The description of the Corpus Christi procession as given in the Popish Kingdom illustrates the demoralization of the pageantry.—Sharp, p. 170.

of the procession through the city. Such seems to be a reasonable interpretation of the facts as presented by the records.

The Prevalence of Craft Cycles.

To the student of records it soon becomes evident that the gilds considered their plays a great financial burden, though one that was usually borne willingly. The account books contain frequent items of expenditure for the plays; the regulations provide for the payment of pageant money by every member of the gild. These plays were a matter of moment also to the city authorities, whose records abound in regulations concerning them, penalties to be laid upon every craft, owning or contributing to a pageant, that does not faithfully discharge its trust. Repeatedly they are said to be to the city's honor and profit, showing that the authorities were not unconscious of the advantage to trade arising from the influx of strangers. Frequently, especially at York, a gild that has become weak is released from the charge of a pageant, and made contributory to one according to its ability. So numerous are the references to the plays in the records of city and gild that I cannot but think that silence on the part of the records in any city is proof that such plays were not maintained in that city.

It is necessary for an understanding of the mutual relationships of these cycles of plays to segregate the gild plays from the multitude of occasional plays and processional shows with which the time abounded. Fortunately, the task of cataloguing the towns that maintained such plays is greatly lightened by a list formed by Miss Lucy Toulmin Smith and published in her edition of York Plays,<sup>1</sup> and reprinted by F. H. Stoddard.<sup>2</sup> This list may include all the towns, though we do not know what further study of town records may bring to light. It surely contains many plays that are not gild plays, and it becomes necessary by a process of elimination to determine what are true craft plays.

---

<sup>1</sup> pp. LXIV-LXVIII.

<sup>2</sup> Stoddard.

NOTES ON THE PUBLISHED LIST OF PLAYS.

1. "Aberdeen, 1442-1531. [Candlemas play, Offerand of Our Lady; also Corpus Christi play, 9, 7, 10 pageants named.]

1440, May 13. Notice of appointment of one Richard Kintor,<sup>1</sup> Abbot of Bon-Accord, and notice of play of Halyblude at Wyndmylhill.<sup>2</sup>

1442. Thir craftes underwritten sal find yearly in ye offerand of our Lady at Candlemas thir personnes underwritten, yat is to say :—

1442. Aberdeen Pageants.<sup>3</sup>

The Littistaris sal fynd,
The Empriour and twa Doctouris and alsomony honeste Squiares as thai may.

The Smythis and Hamermen sal fynd,
The Three Kingis of Culane and alsomony honeste Squiares as thai may.

The Talzoures sal fynd,
Our Lady, Sancte Bride, Sancte Helene,
Joseph and alsomony Squiares as thai may.
The Skynmares sal fynd
Twa Bischopes, four Angels, and alsomony honeste Squiares as they may.

The Wobstares and Walkares sal fynd
Symion and his disciples and alsomony honeste Squiares, etc.

The Cordongars sal fynd
The Messyngear and Moyses and alsomony honeste Squiares, etc.

The Fleschowares sal fynd
Twa or four Woduen and alsomony honeste Squiares.

The Brethren of the Gilde sal fynd
The Knyghtes in barnace and Squiares honestly arait; etc.

The Baxtaris sal fynd

The Menstrals and alsomony honeste Squiares, etc.

1549. Bethune Pageants.<sup>3</sup>

Lingiers. L'Annonciation, 2 personnes.
Viessiers. La Visitation, 2 personnes.
Tanneurs, cordouaniers. La Nativité, 5 personnes.
Les trois Roix, 6 personnes.

Chavettiers. Les Innocents, 12 personnes.
Parmentiers. Purification, 7 personnes.
Marchands et croqueteurs de grès.
Tentation, 6 personnes.

Marchands de blé. Entrée à Jérusalem, 16 personnes.

Drapiers. Resurrection du Lazaire, 8 personnes.

Confrères de Dieu et Mgr. Saint Jacques
La Chesne, 13 personnes.

Voiaige de Emaux.

Barbiers. Jardin d'olivier, 8 personnes.

Porteurs au sac. Prise de Jésus, 30 personnes.
Dieu portant sa croix, 20 personnes.

Cordiers, cailliers. Comment N-S. fut mené devant Anne, 5 personnes.

Dechargeurs. Les deniers que Judas reçut,
5 personnes.

Bouchyers. Comment Judas se pendit.
Jésus mené devant Caïphe, et Herode, 16 personnes.

Feronniers, candreliers, maricaulx estamiers, orpèvres. Comment Dieu fut battu a l'estacq, 12 personnes.

Taverniers, brasseurs. Ecce homo. Pilate lavant ses mains, 12 personnes.

Merchiers, julliers. Comment Jesus fut cloié à la croix, 18 personnes.
Ysaude forgeant les cloux Dieu, 2 personnes.

Tainturiers, satiniers. Crucifiment, a plusieurs personnes.

Ceux de la poterne. Le Limbe, 7 personnes.

<sup>1</sup> Merchant and Craft Guilds, p. 49.

<sup>2</sup> On Corpus Christi day the procession was under the direction of the Abbot of Bon-Accord, later under that of Robin Hood. A fusion of May-day and Corpus Christi seems probable. Wyndmylhill, later Womanhill, seems to have been a play-field like that at Edinburgh.

<sup>3</sup> Jullerville, vol. 2, pp. 212-13.

<sup>4</sup> Records of Aberdeen, p. 432; also, Merchant and Craft Guilds, p. 49.

1442. Aberdeen Pageants.*1549. Bethune Pageants.

Poissoniers. Descente de la croix, 8 personnes.
 Hugiers, marchands de bois, cuveliers. Le sepulchre, 8 personnes.
 Foullons, tistran de drap, pareurs de laine. La Resurrection, 5 personnes.
 Fourniers. Les trois Maries et l'Ange. Jesus en conformé de ung jardinier, 4 personnes.
 Compagnons du pourpoin.
 La remonstrance des Patouriaux, 5 personnes.
 Tappiers de velours, tisserans de toile. L'incrudulité de saint Thomas, 12 personnes.
 Paintres. Les quatre Evangelistes, et saint Jerosme.
 Wantiers, marchands de laine. Le Jugement a plusieurs personnes.

A comparison of the Aberdeen pageants with those of Bethune reveals instantly a kinship, yet the Bethune pageants were a 'mystère mimé.' We are forced to conclude that French influence was exerted in the cities of Scotland upon their plays as well as upon their municipal government, for there can be no doubt that this French series of tableaux is a direct descendant of those that antedate the tableaux of Aberdeen, and that the Aberdeen pageants have their direct antecedents in France and not in England.<sup>1</sup> It is stated that there were at Bethune twenty-eight pageant wagons. It is probable that the pageant of the Fleshers of Aberdeen and the succeeding ones were not carried; the remainder were, as we read (1531) "and tua of ilke craft to pass with the pageant that their furnyss to keip thair geir."<sup>2</sup>

In these processional tableaux we have evidence of the intrusion of allegory, as in the royal entry.<sup>3</sup> The Bethune series is still a cycle of mysteries, but in the Aberdeen plays, although more than a century older, the tableaux no longer have any connection, and we find, a century later, that a representation of the legends of the saints has almost excluded Biblical themes.

1531, May 22. The craftis are chargit to furneiss thair panzeanis vnder written:—
 The flescharis, Sanct Bestian and his Tormentouris.
 The barbouris, Sanct Lowrance and his Tormentouris.
 The skynnaris, Sanct Stewin and his Tormentouris.
 The cordinaris, Sanct Martyne.

<sup>1</sup> A curious survival of Candlemas pageantry in Yorkshire is found in the Bishop Blaize Festival. At Bradford in 1825 the procession contained a King, Queen, Jason, Princess Medea, Bishop Blaize and chaplain, and shepherds. The pageantry is supposed to refer to the woolen industry.—Old Yorkshire, vol. 2, pp. 151-4.

<sup>2</sup> Records of Aberdeen, p. 433.

<sup>3</sup> Cp. p. 87.

The tailzeouris, the Coronatioun of our Lady.
 Litstaris, Sanct Nicholes.
 Wobstaris, walecaris, and bonet makaris, Saint John.
 Baxtaris, Sanct Georg.
 Wrichtis, messonis, selateris, and euparis, The Resurreccioun.
 The smithis and hammirmen to furneiss The Bearmen of the Croce.<sup>1</sup>

The impossibility of forming a connected play out of these tableaux is sufficiently evident. Many other references to the procession might be given; thus in 1484 the penalty of absenteeism was the loss of freedom for a year, i. e., the freedom of the craft, not personal freedom; in 1531, the craft that failed to furnish its pageant must pay a fine of forty shillings.

The order in procession was established by the city fathers and was apparently the same for every procession. The Candlemas and Corpus Christi processions are sometimes mentioned together, but the regulation of 1531 established beyond question that the pageants were for Candlemas. It seems that on Corpus Christi day after the procession a play was usually performed on Windmill-hill. The play is mentioned in a regulation of 1440 and again in 1479, but it probably changed from year to year, and was under the care of the Abbot of Bon-Accord. It certainly was not the charge of the gilds.

II. "Bassingbourne, Cambridgeshire, 1511 (Play of St. George)". Players and musicians were secured in Cambridge. Labor and materials contributed by individuals and by twenty-seven neighboring villages.<sup>2</sup>

III. Bethersden, Kent. 1522 (Ludi beate Christinae). Evidence not published. Probably a church play.

IV. Cambridge, about 1550<sup>3</sup> (Ludus Filiorum Israelis). A school play,<sup>4</sup> probably. William de Leune and Isabel his wife gave at their admission into the gild of Corpus Christi 20 s. 12 d. for alms, and expended in Ludo Filiorum Israelis half-a-mark.

After 1544 there were many plays. In 1546 Jephtha was acted at Christmas. In 1564 Queen Elizabeth was present on Sunday,<sup>5</sup> Aug. 6, at a performance of Aulularia, on Monday of Dido, on Tuesday of Ezechias, which was written by Nicholas Udall. School plays, even when on Biblical themes, are an offshoot from the mystery play, and should be kept distinct.

V. Canterbury, time of Henry IV (Play of Corpus Christi by the crafts). Evidence not at hand. Possible, but out of the district where such plays were in vogue. The lack of allusions to these plays is significant.

1501-2 (Three Kyngs of Coleyn, on Twelfth Day).<sup>6</sup> A special play in connection with a banquet at the Guildhall. Noteworthy for a description of horses constructed of can-

<sup>1</sup> Records of Aberdeen, p. 451.

<sup>2</sup> Sharp, p. 34; also Lyson's Magna Britannia, Cambridgeshire, p. 89; also for items, The Antiquary, vol. 7, 1883, p. 25.

<sup>3</sup> Not 1355, as given by Stoddard.

<sup>4</sup> Retrospective Review, vol. 12, pp. 7-11; Masters, vol. 1, p. 5.

<sup>5</sup> Nichols, vol. 1, p. 186.

<sup>6</sup> Ninth Report of Hist. MSS. Commission, p. 197.

was distended with hoops and laths and painted after nature, at a cost of three shillings. No evidence that the play was ever repeated.

VI. Dublin, 15th century (cycle, 11 plays known; Corpus Christi). Pageants for Corpus Christi, Dublin.<sup>1</sup>

1. Glovers. Adam and Eve with angel bearing sword before them.
2. Corrisces (perhaps curriers). Cain and Abel with offering and altar.
3. Mariners and vintners. Noah and the persons in the ark appareled as carpenters, and salmon-takers.
4. Weavers. Abraham and Isaac with offering and altar.
5. Smiths. Pharaoh and his host.
6. Skinners. Camel<sup>2</sup> with children of Israel.
7. Goldsmiths. King of Cullen.
8. Hoopers. Shepherds with an angel singing Gloria in excelsis Deo.
9. Corpus Christi gild. Christ in his passion with the Marys and angels.
10. Taylors. Pilate with his fellowship, and his wife cloathed accordingly.
11. Barbers. Anna and Caiaphas.
12. Fishers. The Apostles.
13. Merchants. The Prophets.
14. Butchers. The Tormentors.

A comparison of these pageants with those of Aberdeen and Bethune<sup>3</sup> reveals such striking similarities as compel us to pronounce them a series of mute pageants and not a cycle of spoken plays.<sup>4</sup>

This series is much nearer the primitive type than that of Aberdeen, the only breaks in the story appearing in 13 and 14, and in the introduction of the camel<sup>5</sup> in 6.

Furthermore, the allusions in the records to plays and Corpus Christi processions justify this conclusion. In 1541 the procession of Corpus Christi was followed by the play of the Nine Worthies. We read of no cases where the genuine craft plays were so easily abandoned for a new play. It was no unusual thing, however, for the crafts to present plays on festival occasions and before notables. In 1528 certain crafts acted plays during Christmas week before certain high officials.<sup>6</sup> The plays were chosen for some supposed reference to the craft; thus the taylor played Adam and Eve; the shoe-makers, Crispin and Crispianus; the vintners, Bacchus and his story; the carpenters, Joseph and Mary; the smiths, Vulcan and what related to him; the bakers, a comedy of Ceres, the goddess of corn. The Priors of St. John of Jerusalem, of the Blessed Trinity, of All-Hallows, presented, the one the Passion of our Saviour, the others the several deaths which the Apostles suffered. It would

<sup>1</sup> Hist. of Dublin, vol. 1, p. 110.

<sup>2</sup> Cp. with the camel in the pageant show on Midsummer-eve at Chester.—Lyon's Magna Britannica, Cheshire, pp. 583-4.

<sup>3</sup> See p. 95.

<sup>4</sup> Vs. ten Brink, vol. 2, p. 290.

<sup>5</sup> This was possibly copied from some spoken mystery play, though I do not recall one that refers to the camel.

<sup>6</sup> Hist. of Dublin, vol. 1, p. 108.

seem that the play which is extant, Abraham and Isaac, was such an isolated play, and not one of a cycle.<sup>1</sup>

VII. Dunstable, 12th century (St. Catherine). A cloister-drama, probably in Latin.

VIII. Edinburgh, 1503. A play by John English and his company, being the players of the King of England, before James IV at his nuptials with the Princess Margaret at Edinburgh.<sup>2</sup> The records say—

Dec. 1554. The "litill farsche and play" made by William Lander to be performed before the Queen.<sup>3</sup> 1558. Payment to William Adamsoan for a play made for the triumph of our sovereign Lady's marriage.

Payment to William Lamb for setting forth the play.

Payment to all the writers who wrote the play.

Payment to Patrick Doran for writing certain plays.<sup>4</sup>

The Records of Edinburgh are remarkable for their silence concerning plays. In 1503 an ordinance in restraint of plays was passed, from which one infers that English innovations were not viewed wholly with approval. In 1554 the city built a play-field<sup>5</sup> at heavy expense, and there are several entries of that year relating to plays.<sup>6</sup> Plays, however, do not seem to have prospered in Edinburgh, and evidently the city had no craft plays.

IX. "Gloucestershire, 16th century. At Christmas. A kind of miracle play with the characters of Herod, Belzebub, and others." Probably a mumming in character, surely no mystery play.<sup>7</sup>

X. Heybridge, Essex, 1532, no data accessible.

XI. Lancashire, 1800. A mumming similar to that of Gloucestershire.

XII. Leicester, 147 (Passion Play). A play presented by certain players who accounted to the city for receipts. The money and stage properties were devoted to the support of the processional pageants.<sup>8</sup>

1546-1571. Church plays at Church of St. Martin probably. The above appear to have been connected with the "Reading of the Passion on Palm Sunday."<sup>9</sup>

There were plays also at other churches.<sup>10</sup>

St. Mary's church, 1491. Paid to the players on New-Year's day at Even in the church, vi d.

1489. Paid for a play in the church in Dominica infra octave Epiph., ii s.

XIII. Lincoln, 1564 (Play of Old Tobit). An occasional play, played at Broadgate in July. There is no sign that it was repeated.<sup>11</sup>

XIV. London, 12th century (miracle plays). "London, instead of theatrical shows and scenic entertainments, has dramatic performances of a more sacred kind, either representations of the miracles which holy confessors have wrought, or of the passions and sufferings in which the constancy of martyrs was signally displayed."<sup>12</sup>

These were probably Latin plays in churches and cloisters.

<sup>1</sup> Modern Language Notes, vol. 7, No. 6, p. 339 ff.

<sup>2</sup> Collier, vol. 1, p. 39; also Warton, vol. 2, p. 395, note.

<sup>3</sup> Extracts from the Records of Edinburgh, p. 206.

<sup>4</sup> Dalzell, p. 32.

<sup>5</sup> Cp. with Windmillhill at Aberdeen, the play-field of Newcastle-on-Tyne, and the plain for sports in Cornwall.

<sup>6</sup> Extracts from the Records of Edinburgh.

<sup>7</sup> For text of a similar play, see Notices of Leicester, Wm. Kelly, p. 53.

<sup>8</sup> Kelly, p. 27.

<sup>9</sup> Kelly, p. 23.

<sup>10</sup> Kelly, p. 14.

<sup>11</sup> Gentleman's Magazine, vol. 54, p. 103.

<sup>12</sup> Survey of London, p. 214.

1390, July 18, 19, 20. Skinner's Well (Passion of our Lord and the Creation of the World). Played by the Parish-clerk gild.<sup>1</sup> Probably in French and closely modeled upon the plays of the Puy of France.<sup>2</sup> The King contributed 10 l.<sup>3</sup>

1409, Skinner's Well, lasted eight days ('of matter from the creation of the world'). By the same gild. The eight days' duration a significant link to continental tradition, being the octave of a church holy day. Patronized as before by the nobility.

These plays of the Parish clerks hold common traditions with the French plays, and should not be confounded with the other cycle plays of England. There were no craft-gild plays in London. The constant calls upon the guilds for stationary pageants for Royal Entries and for movable pageants for the Lord Mayor's Show, together with their many processions, seem to have made them averse to the additional expense of the craft-gild plays.<sup>4</sup> 1464. The Holy Trinity Gild, St. Botolph without Aldersgate, possessed a roll containing the pageants of the Holy Trinity, St. Fabyan, St. Sebastian, St. Botulf and 'the terement' (The Burial of Christ), 'paynted and lemenyd with gold.'<sup>5</sup> These were in no sense mystery plays, but the roll contained a description and representation of the pageants which were carried in procession by the gild.

1557, June 7th, Grey Friars (Passion of Christ). "The sam day be-gane a stage play at the Grey freers of the Passyon of Cryst."<sup>6</sup> An attempt under Queen Mary to revive old customs.

1557. Church in Silver Street, or Saint Olave's Day (Miraculous History of Saint Olave).<sup>7</sup> Played from 8 p. m. till 12 at night, four hours. A miracle play of the patron saint. An incident in the attempt of the lovers of the old customs to revive them under Queen Mary.

1603. Elie House in Holborn (Christ's Passion). "Witnesse the acting of Christ's Passion at Elie house in Holborne when Gudemore lay there, on Good-Friday at night, at which there were thousands present."<sup>8</sup>

XV. Northumberland, 1512 (Nativity and Resurrection). Plays in the Earl's chapel. The entries of the Household-Book are interesting as showing the prominence given to plays and the station and remuneration of players. The plays are examples of the multitude of occasional plays presented at that time throughout England. It seems that one qualification for my Lord's chaplain was that he "be a maker of Interludes."<sup>9</sup>

XVI. Paris, France, 1313. Special performance before Edward II of England. A mystère mimé.<sup>10</sup> If such are to be listed, there should be added :

1426, Dec. 1st. At entry of Charles VI and Henry V.

1424, Sept. 8th. At entry of the Duke of Beaufort.

1431, Dec. 2nd. At entry of Henry VI, etc.

XVII. Reading, 1498-1557. Evidence not at hand. Evidently church plays such as were presented in every prominent church in the kingdom.

XVIII. Shrewsbury, 1574 (A stage-play acted in the High Street). A play by the players of the Earl of Essex.<sup>11</sup> A study of those companies of players that were coinci-

<sup>1</sup> Survey of London, p. 7; Hone's Ancient Mysteries, p. 206.

<sup>2</sup> See p. 85.

<sup>3</sup> Notices of Leicester, p. 29, referring to Devon's Issues of the Exchequer, p. 244.

<sup>4</sup> It would seem that the entry in Stowe's Survey, p. 7,—“Other smaller wells were many near unto Clarke's well, namely, Skinner's well, so called for that the skimmers of London held there certain plays yearly, played of Holy Scripture,” etc.—were due to a confusion about the clerks' plays which were played at the skimmers' well. I find no other reference to any plays by the skimmers.

<sup>5</sup> Hone, p. 81.

<sup>6</sup> Machyn's Diary, p. 138; Strype, vol. 3, part 2, p. 6.

<sup>7</sup> Strype, vol. 3, part 2, p. 6.

<sup>8</sup> Prymme, Histrio-Mastix, p. 117.

<sup>9</sup> Percy, p. 139.

<sup>10</sup> Jullieville, vol. 2, p. 188; also, see p. 148.

<sup>11</sup> Fosbrooke, vol. 2, p. 665.

dent with the decline of the mystery play would be instructive, but foreign to the study of the mystery.

XIX. Sleaford, 1477. Gild of Holy Trinity (Three Kings of Cologne on Corpus Christi day, and Play of the Ascension). Probably tableaux with explanatory speeches. Possibly full plays. By the crafts.<sup>1</sup>

XX. Tewkesbury, 1578, 1585. Probably church plays.

XXI. Winchester, 1487. By alms boys (Christi descensus ad inferos). Played by the choir-boys of Hyde Abbey and Saint Swithin's Priory before Henry VII on Sunday during dinner, on occasion of the birth of Prince Arthur.<sup>2</sup> A cloister drama.

XXII. Windsor, 1416 (St. George of Cappadocia).<sup>3</sup> To entertain the Emperor Sigismund. Probably a dumb show. Belongs with the pageants and plays of St. George elsewhere exhibited.<sup>4</sup>

XXIII. Witney, Oxfordshire, 16th century (The Resurrection. A dumb show). A puppet show in the church.<sup>5</sup> The same authority refers to similar shows in St. Paul's, London.

XXIV. York, Before 1384. (Our Lord's Prayer). This play when first presented so commended itself to the inhabitants of York that a Gild of the Lord's Prayer was formed to maintain it. A play of the vices and virtues. The MS., delivered to Archbishop Grindal for criticism in 1572, disappeared. Played on movable pageant wagons.<sup>6</sup>

XXV. York, 1446. (Creed Play). Given by the will of William Revetor, keeper of the Corpus Christi Gild, to the gild with the condition that it should be publicly performed every tenth year in various parts of the city. A considerable play, since in 1535 the gild plays were omitted because of it. In 1568 it was sent to Dean Hutton for examination. He advised that it should not be played.<sup>7</sup> Played on movable pageant wagons.

XXVI. Kendall, Preston, and Lancaster. (Corpus Christi plays seen in the reign of James I. "They call this Corpus Christi Play in my countrey which I have seene acted at Preston, and Lancaster, and last of all at Kendall, in the beginning of the raigne of King James."<sup>8</sup>

An anecdote by Rev. John Shaw, 1664, of a man sixty years old who saw once at Kendall a Corpus Christi play where there was a man on a tree and blood ran down.<sup>9</sup>

XXVII. Cornwall, Queen Elizabeth's reign. (Guany myracle play). A cycle of three plays. Played in a circular plain prepared for the purpose.<sup>10</sup>

XXVIII. Newcastle-on-Tyne, 1426-1589. Plays undoubtedly older than 1426. Played in a fixed spot, not on movable pageant wagons.<sup>11</sup> The pageants were, however, carried in procession to the place of acting.

XXIX. Wymondham, 1549. "This was doone before Midsummer, and so it rested till the sixt of Julie, at which time there should be a publike plaie kept at Wymondham, a towne distant from Norwich six miles, which plaie had bene accustomed yearlie to be kept in that towne continuing for the space of one night and one daie at least." Advantage was taken of the concourse of people to foment rebellion.<sup>12</sup>

The list as analyzed yield the following :—

1. Cycle mystery plays by craft gilds, on movable pageant wagons,—Chester (IV), Coventry (V), Worcester, and York.

2. Cycle mystery plays by craft gilds, not on pageant wagons,—Newcastle-on-Tyne (XXVIII), Woodkirk.

<sup>1</sup> Oliver, History of the Holy Trinity Guild at Sleaford.

<sup>2</sup> Warton, vol. 2, p. 394.

<sup>3</sup> Collier, vol. 1, p. 20; Marriott, p. xxvi.

<sup>4</sup> See p. 90.

<sup>5</sup> Lambard, p. 459.

<sup>6</sup> Toulmin Smith, p. 138; York Plays, pp. xxviii, xxix; Davies, p. 265.

<sup>7</sup> Smith, p. xxx; Davies, p. 258; Register of the Gild of Corpus Christi, p. 24.

<sup>8</sup> Weever's Funeral Monuments, as given by Sharp, p. 133.

<sup>9</sup> Halliwell-Phillipps, vol. 1, p. 48.

<sup>10</sup> Cut of field, Borkase, p. 197.

<sup>11</sup> Brand, vol. 2, pp. 369-379; also in the account of each craft.

<sup>12</sup> Holinshead, vol. 3, p. 963.

3. Cycle mystery plays by craft gilds, mode of presentation unknown,—Beverly.
4. Possibly cycle mystery plays by craft gilds,—Sleaford (XIX) (?) Preston, Lancaster, Kendall (XXVI), Canterbury in time of Henry IV, Wymondham (XXIX).
5. Cycle plays, not mystery, on pageant wagons,—York, Our Lord's Prayer (XXIV); York, Creed Play (XXV).
6. Cycle mystery plays, not by craft gilds,—
  - a. By literary society,—London by Parish clerks (XIV).
  - b. By wandering troupe (?)—Coventry.
  - c. By the parish and the priests,—Cornwall (XXVII).
7. Single religious play by religious gild,—Sleaford (XIX).
8. Single religious play in connection with church service,—Bethersden, Heybridge (X), Leicester, 1546-71 (XII), Reading (XVII), Tewksbury (XX).
9. Plays in the chapels and castles of nobility,—Northumberland (XV).
10. Puppet mystery, a form of church mute mystery,—Witney (XXIII).
11. Occasional plays, mystery or otherwise,—Bassingbourne, Canterbury, 1501-2, Edinburgh (VIII), Leicester, 1477 (XII), Lincoln (XIII), London, 1556, 1557, 1603 (XIV), Windsor (XXII).
12. School or cloister dramas,—Cambridge, Dunstable (VII), London, 12th century (XIV), Winchester (XXI).
13. Processional pageants,—Aberdeen, Dublin (VI), London by Holy Trinity Gild (XIV).
14. Christmas mummings,—Gloucestershire (IX), Lancashire (XI).
15. Royal entry,—Paris (XVI).
16. Play by company under the protection of some noble,—Shrewsbury (XVIII).

---

XVIII.

THE DEVELOPMENT OF THE NORTHERN SEPTENAR STANZA.

The English Mystery Plays present a bewildering variety of metres and stanzas. In this variety, however, it may be expected that individuality of authorship will reveal itself, since a scribe is less likely to distort beyond recognition stanzaic structure than to destroy dialectal peculiarities in the changes of transcription. But a study of the prosody of the plays involves the discussion of nearly all the forms of Middle English metre. It seems best, therefore, to consider in brief the genesis of the leading types of English mediæval metres.

The Latin of the Middle Ages was the reservoir from which the Western literatures in common drew their metres. Within the centuries preceding the rise of national literatures, the Latin of the church had ceased to regard quantity, and had conformed to the vulgar dialects in placing the stress upon the root syllable. Consequently the monkish verse was an accentual verse, which, however, although regardless of quantity, still gave heed to the regular succession of stressed and unstressed syllables.

This verse under the influence of accent assumed new characteristics. The metrical foot and the word became coincident, the line with feminine ending prevailed, rime arose, and because of the frequent occurrence of similar endings in Latin, that species of rime known to the French as 'entrelacée,' or 'lacé,' where a succession of lines, mounting sometimes into the hundreds, have but one rime, became a famous metrical resource.

The verse forms became fixed as types which were recognized as the proper vehicles of expression, each for a variety of literature. Thus the 7-accent line, or septenar, was used in satirical or political poetry. Stanzaic formations, from which arose the 12-line stanza to which the English metrical romance writers were so partial, are found in church proses and Latin church mysteries.

From these Latin metres directly, or through the medium of the French, arose the English metrical lines, which were, in general, of three varieties: the 7-accent line, or septenar, the 6-accent line, or Alexandrine, and the 4-accent line. These lines were combined in various ways to form stanzas; sometimes a model already established in French or Latin was followed; sometimes a new stanzaic form, the product of national genius, was originated; but in ultimate analysis each stanza can be resolved into lines of the three types—the possible occurrence of a 5-accent line will be discussed later—unless it be a direct imitation of a less usual French or Latin type.

The Latin septenar was cultivated in England. It was used for political poems from the time of King John, and probably earlier, and was the customary form for the goliardic poems which usually pass under the name of Walter Map. From this line and the stanzaic structure arising therefrom, sprang, without the aid of French influence, as I think, the typical form of the septenar stanza in the poetry of the north of England. To this we will turn our attention first.

In studying the English poetry of the septenar stanza, attention must be paid to the mode of publication, for the poetic form was closely molded to the known needs of utterance. In the North the gleeman was still welcome to the home of the franklin or the hut of the peasant. The tradition of the fathers had not been broken, as in the South, by the intrusion of the jongleur with the fashions and tales of France. We may believe that, harp in hand, the bard still recited the warlike deeds of the fathers in the alliterative measures of the Old English, until the church poets furnished him with ballads and pious songs, formed, as we shall see, upon the Latin septenar. These were sung with the accompaniment of the harp in a recitative delivery, imitated, it may be, in part from the rhythmic intonation of the church service.

For such delivery the harp is preëminently the instrument. It is wholly responsive to the will of the reciter, who can heighten the accent of his lines, and even supply a rhythmic stress, where the poet's art failed him, by a touch of the harp-string. A succession of light unstressed syllables can be run, or two stressed syllables in juxtaposition separated, by a slide of the voice, with the aid of the instrument. To poet and reciter alike the feet of classical metres were unknown; so long as the musical rhythm of the verse was maintained, he cared nothing for trochees or anapaests, and for this task the harp was his ablest coadjutor.

The discussion here concerns itself directly with the septenar stanza of the ancient Bernicia, that district extending from the Humber through the Lowlands of Scotland. No position is taken regarding the scansion of later English metres, formed under the influence of classical models, or dominated by French metrical systems. The stanza was formed from a Latin measure that had cast off all the laws of the classics. Under the law of accent, subject only to the requirements of recitative delivery, it ran its career, as we shall see, from the regularity of the Latin septenar to a lawlessness that tolerated an excess of unstressed syllables so extreme that the voice of the reciter must needs find rest in irregular stresses.

Indirectly, our contention touches also the metres whose district lies south of this, for the regularity of the Latin and French metres was corrupted through contact with the popular measure of the North. Indeed, it was this principle, best illustrated in the septenar, that, through its sturdy resistance to the classicists of the Elizabethan age, compelled a compromise and saved our prosody from the level monotony of excessive uniformity of movement.

However, it is sufficient for this discussion that the reader should abandon as futile all attempts to analyze into classical feet the English verses which follow, and read them with natural stresses, running the unstressed syllables as nearly as possible in a recitative monotone. Semi-stresses occur, occasionally two semi-stresses take the place of a full stress, and often a slide or prolongation of a stressed syllable, or a cæsura, is the only separation between two stressed syllables; but these semi-stresses, for the sake of simplicity of presentation, I have ignored, using only the breve and the macron for unstressed and stressed syllables respectively.

Another agent in the formation of this stanza was alliteration, for which the poetic consciousness of the people still made its demands. The letter-rime, coinciding with the stress, heightened the accent, and rendered the unstressed syllables of still less importance. The old alliterative verse was very similar to the first half-verse of the 7-accent line. The Northern poets took the septenar line in its stanzaic form and laid upon it the requirements of their ancient poetry, thus building for themselves a characteristic stanza, distinctive, as I believe, of the poets north of the Humber.

It becomes necessary now for us to trace in support of these propositions the rise of the septenar stanza, and to note carefully the laws of its formation. Of the Latin septenar of the thirteenth century examples are abundant. It was the usual vehicle, as has been said, for political song and satire.

Ex. 1. The Battle of Lewes. Middle of thirteenth century.
Lines 1-4.

Cálamús velócitér : scribe sic scribéntis,
Língua laúdabílitér : té benédicéntis,
Dói pátris dexterá || dómínó virtútem,
Quí das tús prospérá || quándo vís ad nútum :

— u — u — u — " — u — u — u —
— u — u — u — u — " — u — u — u —
— u — u — u — u — " — u — u — u —
— u — u — u — u — " — u — u — u —

a a b b etc.

Characteristics :—Rime by couplets, no stanzaic structure, masculine cæsura, feminine rime, stress follows the cæsura, trochaic movement, regular succession of stressed and unstressed syllables, cæsura regularly divides verse into a first half of four accents and second half of three accents, attempt at coincidence of verse and word accent,<sup>1</sup> but not fully carried out in the second half-verse, riming cæsuras.

<sup>1</sup> Wright, p. 72.

This is the typical form of the Latin septenar, and shows clearly its derivation from the classical dactylic hexameter.<sup>2</sup> The masculine cæsura and feminine verse-ending have been retained. Quantity has been exchanged for accent, the trochaic movement has superseded the dactylic, and an accent has been added to the first half-verse.

Ex. 2. The Song of the Welsh.<sup>3</sup> Thirteenth century. Last tetrastich.

ístis súis finibús || cóntigít regnáre;
íllis dúces, prásidés, || réges triúmpháre,
quíbus nullo méritó || sé possint aequáre;
ést quon régnaré longé || plús indúperáre.

— u — u — u — " — u — u — u — u }
— u — u — u — u " — u — u — u — u }
— u — u — u — u " — u — u — u — u }
— u — u — u — u " — u — u — u — u }

a a a a.

Characteristics :—Rime entrelacée, cæsuras without rime, otherwise as Ex. 1.

The frequent occurrence in Latin of the same termination made it possible for the poet to continue his verse indefinitely with a single rime; thus in the 'Dialogus Inter Corpus et Animam' fifteen lines rime entrelacée. The French poets, however, excelled in this species of verbal gymnastic, the author of the Thesaur de Pierre de Corbian<sup>4</sup> riming its eight hundred and forty lines on the ending 'ens.'

Ex. 3. Dialogus inter Corpus et Animam.<sup>5</sup> Lines 105–109.

Múndus ét damóniúm || légem sánxire mútuam,
fráudis ad consórtium || cárnem tráhentes fátuam
éorúmque blánditijs || cáro séducit ánimam
quám a virtútum eúlminé || tráhit ad pártém ínfimam,
quí statim cárnem séquitúr || út bos dúctus ad víctimam.

— u — u — u — u " — u — u — u — u }
— u — u — u — u " — u — u — u — u }
— u — u — u — u " — u — u — u — u }
— u — u — u — u " — u — u — u — u }

a a a a.

<sup>1</sup> See 'Der lateinische accent,' by P. Lange, Philologus, vol. 31, p. 107; also Handbuch der Klassischen Altertums-Wissenschaft, vol. 2, p. 595, art. 128, 5.

<sup>2</sup> The trochaic septenar was favored by the late Latin writers, but differed from the mediæval septenar in essential points.—Handbuch, p. 596, art. 131.

<sup>3</sup> Wright, p. 58.

<sup>4</sup> Grand Dictionnaire Universelle s. v. Rime.

<sup>5</sup> Poems of Walter Mapes, p. 99.

Characteristics :—The intrusion of the dactylic movement in every verse position except the second, otherwise as Ex. 2. In the poem this stanza is preceded and followed by septenar stanzas on the model of Ex. 2.

Ex. 4. De Pravitate Sæculi.<sup>1</sup> Lines 29–33.

Sed ne vós detineám || túrbine sermónum,
múndi cáput córruít || nón habét patrónum :
úbinám est hódié || virtus Scipiónum,
Márcellúsque loquáx || et nómina vána Catónum ?

— u — u — u — " — u — u — u }
— u — u — u — " — u — u — u }
— u — u — u — " — u — u — u }
— u — u — u — " — u — u — u }

a a a a.

Characteristics :—The tendency shown in Ex. 3 has been reduced to system, the fourth verse becoming dactylic by the loss of one stress in the first half-verse and the removal of stress from the syllable immediately following the cæsura. There are many irregularities in this poem, but the intention of the author seems evident from such fourth lines as—Júpiter ésse piúm || statuít quodeúmque juváret.

We return now to Ex. 1. This passage rimes at the cæsuras by couplets, and can therefore be written as two quatrains. But these quatrains were easily bound together into one stanza by alternating rime, as is shown by the following lines taken from the same poem.

Ex. 5. Lines 159–162.

Inferéntes miseris
Quí non súnť cordáti,
Née divíni múnérís
Grátia firmáti,
Cárnis desidériis
ánimáles dáti,
Cújus ímmundítiis,
brúťis cómparáti,

— u — u — u — }
— u — u — u — }
— u — u — u — }
— u — u — u — }
— u — u — u — }

a b a b a b.

Since the Latin 7-accent line was not inconveniently long, it was usually written as such ; but in English the above form was favored, and, through the prominence thus given to the cæsura, riming half-verses increased in frequency, and one type of English stanza became fixed.

Another form of stanza arises from a different combination of 7-accent couplets of the type of Ex. 1. The two couplets given as Ex. 1 may be written by taking the first half-verses alternately, and then the second half-verses in like order. The stanza thus becomes as follows—

<sup>1</sup> Poems of Walter Mapes, p. 159.

But rhythmical proportion seems to require that the first stanzaic section shall exceed the second in the number of verses, standing either six to four, or eight to four or six. The correspondence between the octet and sestet of the sonnet and the eight and six of the septenar stanza would seem to argue a psychological basis for this division.

Ex. 6. De Nummo.<sup>1</sup> First stanza.

That these verses are derived from the septenar is proved—

1. By the retention of the masculine rimes in the first six lines.
2. By the use of feminine rimes in last four lines.
3. By the entrelacée rime of the last four lines, a favorite rime in septenar lines.

In the six examples given above the movement is without exception trochaic. This was not an essential characteristic of the 7-accent line. The Latin septenar was usually trochaic, but the French and English were more frequently iambic.

Ex. 7. Song from 'Carmina Burana.'<sup>2</sup>

Fortúnae róta vólvitúr, || descéndo mínorátus ;
 altér in áltum tóllitúr || nimis éxaltátus ;
 réx sedt in vérticé, || cáveát ruínám,
 nám sub áxe léginús, || Héecubám reginám.

<sup>1</sup> Poems of Walter Mapes, p. 226.

<sup>2</sup> Schipper, vol. 1, p. 90.

Characteristics:—On the model of Ex. 1, but with confusion of trochaic and iambic movement, a tendency to insert an unstressed syllable after the caesura in iambic lines; usually the first half-verses of couplets have the same movement, the change, when made, arising from the stressed or unstressed condition of the vowel following the caesura. The example illustrates unintentional rimes, the first couplet riming at the caesura, the second not so riming.

Ex. 8. The Lament of Simon de Montfort.<sup>1</sup> First stanza.

Chauntér m'estoit, mon cuër le voit, ¶ en ün duré langage,
Tut ün ploräunt fust fêt le chaünt de nöstre dus báronäge,
Que pur la pées, si loýnz après ¶ se lèsserént destrére,
Lur eörs trenchér, e démenbrér, ¶ pur sálver Éngletérre,
Ore ést oey's la llür de pris, ¶ qe taünt savóit de guére, Ly quéüs Montfört, sa düre mórt ¶ molt énploirá la tórre.

u—u—u—u—u—u—u—u—
 u—u—u—u—u—u—u—u—
 u—u—u—u—u—u—u—u—
 u—u—u—u—u—u—u—u—
 u—u—u—u—u—u—u—u—
 u—u—u—u—u—u—u—u—

Characteristics:—This stanza is formed according to one form cited by Dante,<sup>2</sup> two couplets (pedes), and a closing couplet (cauda). The change to iambic movement is complete, and is accompanied by the insertion of an unstressed syllable after the caesura; the rimes become masculine through the influence of the iambic movement.

The lines, however, contain concealed rimes at the second and fourth stresses, rendering possible a stanzaic scheme as iambic dimeter. The first couplet forms, then, a stanza thus—

u—u—u—
 u—u—u—
 u—u—u—
 u—u—u—
 u—u—u—
 u—u—u—
 u—u—u—
 u—u—u—
 a a b e c b.

This stanzaic structure passed into English, and was cultivated by Dunbar,<sup>3</sup> Wyatt,<sup>4</sup> and others.

As derived from the Latin septenar with double feminine rime and trochaic movement, it must be of a very early date, as it is found in the hymn on the Epiphany<sup>5</sup> of the ninth century, with the following scheme—

—u—u—
 —u—u—
 —u—u—
 —u—u—
 —u—u—
 —u—u—
 —u—u—
 —u—u—a a b e c b.

<sup>1</sup> Wright, p. 125.

<sup>2</sup> Dante, p. 232.

<sup>3</sup> Vol. 1, p. 93,—“Of the Ladyis Solistaris at Court.”

<sup>4</sup> Guest, p. 587.

<sup>5</sup> Guest, p. 586.

This stanza became very popular for church lyrics in England<sup>1</sup> and France.

The form passed also into English, but, as English taste is averse to double feminine rimes, the second unstressed syllable received a stress, and oftentimes other verses were given masculine rimes by dropping final unstressed syllables; such an example is, in Shakespeare, Puck's song,<sup>2</sup> "On the ground," etc.; this is in sharp contrast with the song of Pyramus, "But stay, O spite!" which is in the same stanza with iambic movement.<sup>3</sup>

From this stanza as type many other forms arose in church prose, and passed thence into profane literature ; but, as they are foreign to our purpose, we turn to the consideration of the 7-accent line in English.

Ex. 9. Poema Morale,<sup>4</sup> date of MS. about 1200, of poem about 1170. Dialect South-English. First complet.

Íc am élder, thánne ic wés, ⁊ a wintre and éc a lóre ; ic eáldi móre, thánne ic dède : ⁊ mi wít óghte to bi móre.

—U—U—U—11U—UU—U—U
U—U—U—U—11U— —UUU—U

Characteristics :—In common with Ex. 1, rime by couplets, no stanzaic structure, masculine cæsura divides verse into a first half-verse of four stresses and a second of three stresses. As different from Ex. 1, confusion of trochaic and iambic movements, irregular succession of stressed and unstressed syllables, unstressed syllable following cæsura, or stressed, as—

Ne máí him nó man ál swo wél : démen né swo rihte:

Two points are, however, fairly well established—

1. If a stressed syllable follows the caesura, the line will usually begin with the trochaic movement.

2. The two verses of the couplet will usually agree in this matter:

This measure, written in stanzas of four verses, second and fourth rhyming, or in quatrains, is termed in English hymnology 'Common Metre.' It forms also a favorite ballad measure for Northern ballads.

Ex. 10. St. Stephen and Herod.<sup>6</sup> Second stanza.

Steuyn out of kéchone eám || wyth bóris héd on hónde,
 Ile sáw a stérre was fáyr and brýgt || oúer Bédlem stónde.

$$\left. \begin{array}{l} -\text{O}-\text{O}=\text{O}=\text{H}-\text{O}=\text{O}=\text{O} \\ \text{O}=\text{O}=\text{O}-\text{O}-\text{H}-\text{O}-\text{O}=\text{O} \end{array} \right\} \text{B}$$

<sup>1</sup> Analecta Liturgica, Fasciculus V, Prosa Ecclesiae Abrincensis, p. 319; also in Prosa Ecclesiae Sancti Dionysii, p. 360.

<sup>2</sup> M. N. D. S. 2.

<sup>3</sup> M. N. D. 5, 1.

<sup>4</sup> Anglia 1, p. 6.

<sup>5</sup> Child, vol. 1, p. 241.

<sup>6</sup> For discussion of alliteration in septenar stanzas see p. 113 ff.

The ballad stanza is, however, customarily written in four verses ; thus, in 'Lady Isabel and the Elf-Knight,' first stanza.<sup>1</sup>

Or in 'Georgie,'<sup>2</sup> second stanza—

It may be added in passing that a rare form of ballad stanza, that of the 'Not-browne Mayd,'<sup>3</sup> is derived from the iambic dimeter under Ex. 8. Second stanza.

This affords an illustration of the resolution of the full stanza of Ex. 8, and keeps the proportion of the type between 'pedes' and 'cauda.'

To return again to the septenar, and cite additional illustrations of the close modeling of the English stanza upon the Latin.

Ex. 11. A song.<sup>4</sup> Fifth stanza. Southern dialect.

Be stille, þou fól, y cállle þou riht, ⁊ cóst þou néuer blýnne?
þón art wayted dáy & nýht ⁊ wiþ fíder & ál my kýnne;
bé þou in mi boúr ytáke, ⁊ lête þey fór no sýnne méc to hólde, & þé to slóu: ⁊ þe déþ so þóu maht wýnne?

Characteristics:—Those of Ex. 2 and Ex. 9 feminine rimes and entrelacée.

<sup>1</sup> Child, vol. 1, p. 57.

<sup>2</sup> Child, vol. 7, p. 140.

<sup>3</sup> Percy, vol. 2, p. 193.

<sup>4</sup> Béddeker, p. 172.

Ex. 12. A Song against the Monks.<sup>1</sup> Dialect of Mercia.

Freeres, freeres, wo ge be!
 ministri malorum,
 For many a mannes soule bring ge ad penas infernorum,

There are many poems in which the first half-verse is in English and the second in Latin.

The septenar couplet with riming cæsuras is very common in English of every period, and is usually written in quatrain stanzas. The romancers, however, rarely used it; still, examples can be found in the metrical romances.

Ex. 13. Sir Ferumbras.<sup>2</sup> Supposed date 1377. Lines 2401-2.

Wanne þe day him was a-falle
 & tyme was come to walke,
 Maubyn toward þe castel walle
 pryuyliche gan him stalke:

This measure continues through line 3410. The dialect is thought to be Southern.

Ex. 14. The Five Joys of the Virgin.<sup>3</sup> Southern dialect. Stanza 5.

þe kīng | þat wés of þé | ibóre,
 to heóuene hé þe vótte.
 Tó þare blisse || þat wés for-lóre,
 and bi hym seólu sétte.
 Vór | he hédde þé | icóre,
 wel véyre hé þe grótte.
 Blýþe | wére þú | þer-vóre.
 þo éngles þé imétte.

0 — 0 — 0 — 0 — 0
 0 — 0 — 0 — 0 — 0
 0 — 0 — 0 — 0 — 0
 — 0 — 0 — 0 — 0 — 0 0 — 0 — 0 — 0 — 0
 — 0 — 0 — 0 — 0 — 0
 0 — 0 — 0 — 0 — 0

This stanza is of frequent occurrence: in the Southern dialect both with and without feminine<sup>4</sup> rimes; in the Northern dialect more often with masculine rimes.

Ex. 15. The Duty of Christians.<sup>5</sup>

0 — 0 — 0 — 0 — 0
 0 — 0 — 0 — 0 — 0
 0 — 0 — 0 — 0 — 0
 0 — 0 — 0 — 0 — 0
 0 — 0 — 0 — 0 — 0

a b a b a b a b<sup>6</sup>

This is upon the model of Ex. 5.

<sup>1</sup> Schipper, vol. 1, p. 350.

<sup>2</sup> E. E. T. S. No. 34.

<sup>3</sup> E. E. T. S. No. 49, p. 87.

<sup>4</sup> I shall not attempt to solve the problem of the syllabification of unstressed final e. In general, I believe it to have been pronounced in the South, and silent in the North, but it was pronounced over a wider area in the earlier centuries under review than in the later, and was at all times subject to various rules and to the exigencies of prosody.

<sup>5</sup> E. E. T. S. No. 49, p. 141.

<sup>6</sup> The metrical scheme as printed is not quite right. At the end of each of the even lines (2, 4, 6, 8) there should be added a breve (v),

The examples of the septenar stanza have so far been drawn from the Southern and Midland dialects, with the exception of certain ballad forms. Alliteration has played no important part in the verse. The stanza has been bound by no laws not absolutely necessary for its formation. As we pass to the North, however, an important difference appears. Great technical mastery of this, the favorite stanza, is evident. Alliteration becomes prominent and obligatory. The verses receive a different arrangement from that known in the South. A new type of stanza is established, with a life history of its own.

Of the process by which this result was attained, we know but little. Few records of the early attempts of these poets have survived. We find the typical stanza, with verse arrangement as in the Latin, Ex. 6, fully established, certain requirements in alliteration recognized, and the poets experimenting with various methods of ornamentation.

It seems best to consider first the varieties of ornamentation and structure in a familiar stanzaic form. The example chosen might be written as iambic dimeter,<sup>1</sup> as in Ex. 10, but the stanza would be inordinately long. Moreover, this leonine rime was cultivated in the North when, oftentimes, it was not carried out with sufficient regularity to admit of resolution. In my opinion the author intended this for a septenar stanza in 4's and 3's, without riming primary cæsuras, i. e. at the close of the 4's, and with entrelacée long lines, i. e. entrelacée 3's, although the lack of rime with the primary cæsuras is very unusual.

The development of the stanza can, then, be briefly stated as follows—

1. A septenar stanza of six verses, the first four constituting the 'pedes,' the last two a closing couplet, or 'cauda.'
2. The first four verses rime entrelacée.
3. Structural alliteration imposed upon the 7-stress line.
4. Resolution of the 7-stress lines, forming a 12-verse stanza, without riming primary cæsuras, but with secondary cæsuras following the second stress in the 4-stress verse.
5. Leonine rime in the 4-stress verse, which might, therefore, be written as dimeter, since the rime is carried consistently through the poem.

A word concerning structural alliteration is here in place. The Old English verse measure was based in great part on alliteration.

---

<sup>1</sup> Schipper, vol. I, p. 366.

The law of structure has been most concisely given in the words ;<sup>1</sup> "It [alliteration] consists in the employment of the same or similar sounds at the beginning of a syllable which receives the primary stress. The second hemistich contains one such alliterative syllable, as a rule that which has the first primary stress ; the first hemistich has regularly two, though frequently only one. The alliterative sound must be the same throughout, if consonantal ; if vocalic, it is usually different in the three syllables."

It may be affirmed, in general, that the laws of Old English alliteration obtained in the Middle English period in the septenar line of the Northern English. Sometimes, however, the 7-stress verse was considered as a whole, as in the following example ; sometimes the 4-stress line constituted the verse, and in neither case does the author hesitate to place the two alliterative syllables in either half-verse, as may best suit his convenience. Structural alliteration in Middle English, then, consists of three alliterative syllables under the primary stress, two of which should be in one half-verse—more generally in the first—and one in the other.

Alliteration for ornament continually increased both in the North and South, showing itself in the following ways—

1. By excessive alliteration.
2. By alliteration in semi-stressed syllables.
3. By alliteration in unstressed syllables.
4. By alliteration of different consonantal sounds, as f with v or w, s with sh, etc.<sup>2</sup>
5. By disregard of the primary stress in placing alliteration.

Ex. 16. Moral Poem, by Richard Rolle de Hampole.<sup>3</sup>

When Ádam dálfe † and Éve spáne,
 So spíre if þóu may spéde.
 Wháre was þán † the pride of mán, þat nów mérres his móde ?
 Of érthe and láme † as wás Adám,
 Náked to nóye and núde.
 Wé er, als hé, † náked to bé,
 Whills wé þis lífe sail léde.
 With Í and oé † bórne er wé,
 As Sálamón vs highte,
 To trávell hére † whills wé er fére,
 As féwle vn-tó þe flýghte.

<sup>1</sup> Cook, p. li.

<sup>2</sup> Die Alliterierende Langzeile, by Rosenthal, Anglia I, p. 440.

<sup>3</sup> E. E. T. S. No. 26.

Ex. 18. York Plays, No. X, stanza 1.

Grett gód, | þat álle þis wórlð | has wroúght,
 And wisely wóte || both gód and ílle,
 I thánk hym thráty || in my thought
 Of áll his láne || he léns me tílle.
 That þús fro bárenhede || hás me bróghit,
 A húnðereth wýnter || tó fúlfílle,
 Thou gráunte me mýght || so þát I móught
 Órdan my wérkis || áfter þi wílle.
 Fór in this értþely lýffe
 Ar nón to gód more boúne,
 Thén is í and my wýffe
 For frénshippe wé haue founne.

This stanza illustrates the typical septenar stanza within the limits of the ancient Northumbria. It is, however, an imperfect example, since signs of deterioration are present, especially as regards alliteration. Possibly a perfect specimen was never produced. But such as it is, it will enable us to establish the characteristics of the stanza, and will give us a starting point from which to trace the variations, expansion, and disorganization of the stanza in its later history. With immaterial changes this form appears in the York plays II, X, XI, XX, XXIII, XXIV, XXVII, XXXV, XXXVII, XLIV, and in portions of XII, XV, XVII.

Characteristics :—

1. A first section of eight verses with two alternate rimes. Variation in this section marks extreme deterioration of stanza.

2. A second section, consisting of a 3-stress quatrain.

This frequently contains six verses, and may vary in the method of riming.

3. The regular iambic movement. The stanza drifts steadily toward the anapestic movement, finally exceeds it in the number of unstressed syllables, and breaks down through lack of carrying power in the voice; then irregular accents are introduced, and the first verses of the stanza receive five or six accents.

4. In alliteration this stanza shows—

a) The type, in verse 3.

b) Cross alliteration, in verse 8.

c) Double alliteration with one syllable a semi-stress, in verses 1 and 5.

d) Alliteration with unstressed syllable, in verse 7.

e) Deficient alliteration, in verses 2, 4, and 6.

f) The presence of but little alliteration in the second section.

All the stanzas of these York plays show some irregularities, but many have fewer exceptions than this.

5. Distinguishing marks of early formation—

a) Lack of excessive alliteration.

b) Regularity of iambic movement.

c) Typical rime in second section.

d) Absence of 'bob.'

Whether the double quatrain stanza, with structural alliteration and masculine rimes throughout, is of earlier or later construction than examples 17 and 18, admits of doubt. I incline to think it later, and formed from Ex. 18 by omitting the cauda. In any case there is proof that the same author wrote in both stanzas at a time when, if the evidence can be trusted, a poet usually confined his efforts to one style of English verse. The similarity of these double quatrains to Ex. 18 is quickly seen.

Ex. 19. York Plays No. VIII, last stanza—

In Ex. 18 the beginning of stanzaic deterioration, as shown by irregularities of alliteration, was noted, but in neither Ex. 17 nor Ex. 18 was there any variation from alternate riming. This, together with masculine verse endings, must be retained so long as consciousness of the origin of the stanza from the English septenar is present. But with the loss of the tradition a departure from the type may be expected. Now in the Latin stanza the entrelacée rime was the favorite; therefore contamination of the English type through entrelacée rime might be expected. Furthermore, as a correspondence between the sonnet and this stanza oftentimes holds as regards the division into octet and sestet, so here we might expect to find, as in the sonnet, that the cauda departs more readily from the established type than does the double quatrain. Accordingly, since we have found deterioration in alliteration in the work of this poet, we need not be surprised at finding entrelacée rime in the cauda of his stanza.

<sup>1</sup> See p. 143.

<sup>2</sup> A curve should extend to the last line, as to the preceding.

Ex. 20. York Plays. No. IX. Stanza 1.

|                     |   |                              |
|---------------------|---|------------------------------|
| U = U = U = U =     | } | a b a b a b a b e d e e e d. |
| U — U — " U = U =   |   |                              |
| U — U = " U = U =   |   |                              |
| U — U — " U = U =   |   |                              |
| U = U = " U U = U = |   |                              |
| U = U = " U U = U = |   |                              |
| U — U = " U = U =   |   |                              |
| U = U = " U = U =   |   |                              |
| U = U — U —         |   |                              |
| U = U = U =         |   |                              |
| U — U — U —         |   |                              |
| U = U = U U —       |   |                              |
| U = U U = U =       |   |                              |
| U = U = U —         |   |                              |

The author is evidently experimenting, since he misses through the insertion of the first line of the cauda a favorite riming form of the Coventry and Woodkirk plays, a type that had at a later date a profound influence upon the septenar stanza.

The alliteration is excessive, but the iambic movement is fairly regular, and rime tests, as we shall see later, go to prove this play the work of the author of X and VIII. Comparison with play XXVI, which follows, will immediately reveal the difference in stanza, although the riming is the same.

Ex. 21. York Plays. No. XXVI. Stanza 4.

|                             |   |                              |
|-----------------------------|---|------------------------------|
| U U U = U U = " U = U U =   | } | a b a b a b a b e d e e e d. |
| U U U = U U = " U = U U =   |   |                              |
| U U U — U = U " = " U =     |   |                              |
| U U U = U U U = " U = U U = |   |                              |
| U U U = " U " U = U U U =   |   |                              |
| U = U U U = " U = U U =     |   |                              |
| U = U U = U " = U U =       |   |                              |
| U U U = U U = " U = U U =   |   |                              |
| U U = U — U U =             |   |                              |
| U = U U = U U =             |   |                              |
| U = U U = U U =             |   |                              |
| U U = U — U U =             |   |                              |
| U = U U = U U =             |   |                              |
| U = U U = U U =             |   |                              |

The direction of the deterioration is evident. All stressed syllables but two, and four unstressed syllables, have alliteration in this stanza. Such overloading with alliterative sounds destroyed all sense of their proper function. The first half-verses have passed the bounds of anapaestic movement. The voice naturally places a stress upon the first unstressed syllable, thus transforming the verse into a 5-stress line and destroying the stanza. It is significant that this quasi 5-stress line was considered the most suitable for royal personages. Many instances might be cited of this anticipation of 'Marlowe's mighty line.'

XIX.

CERTAIN STANZAS OF THE MYSTERY PLAYS.

The later forms of the septenar stanza do not particularly concern us, as they lie outside of the Mystery Plays. I will therefore pass over them rapidly, giving the stanzaic schemes for completeness of view and for comparison with the Southern stanza toward which they gravitated.

Ex. 22. Prologue to the Eighth Book of the Aeneid by G. Douglas, date 1513.<sup>1</sup> Last stanza.

Diagram 1 shows a complex knot diagram with multiple crossings. The diagram is labeled "ababababedddd.2".

Lines 4 and 5 have the same alliterative letter, the letter s.

Ex. 23. The Howlate of Holland, date 1450-54.<sup>9</sup> Stanza 2.

<sup>1</sup> Schipper, vol. 1, p. 221.

<sup>2</sup> In the first line, the macrons (—) should each be read as double macrons (=), and another one should be inserted just before the caesura.

<sup>3</sup> Pinkerton, vol. 3, p. 147.

$\text{uu} = \text{uu} = \text{u} = \text{uu} =$
 $\text{uu} = \text{uu} = \text{u} = \text{uu} =$
 $\text{uu} = \text{uuu} = \text{u} = \text{uu} =$
 $\text{uuu} = \text{uu} = \text{u} = \text{uu} =$
 $\text{uu} = \text{uuu} = \text{u} = \text{uu} =$
 $\text{uuu} = \text{uu} = \text{u} = \text{uu} =$
 $\text{u} = \text{uu} = \text{uuu} = \text{uu} =$
 $\text{u} = \text{uu} = \text{uuu} = \text{uu} =$
 $\text{uu} = \text{uu} = \text{u} = \text{uuu} =$
 $\text{u} = \text{uuu} =$
 $\text{u} = \text{uu} =$
 $\text{uuu} = \text{uu} =$
 $\text{uu} =$

ababababedddde;<sup>1</sup>

Lines 3 and 4 have the same alliterative letter, the letter b; lines 5 and 6 have l; lines 12 and 13 have h.

Ex. 24. Gawan and Gologras,<sup>2</sup> date about 1500. Stanza 3.

$\text{uu} = \text{uuu} = \text{u} = \text{uu} = \text{u}$
 $= \text{uuu} = \text{u} = \text{uu} =$
 $\text{uu} = \text{uu} = \text{u} = \text{uu} = \text{u}$
 $= \text{uu} = \text{uuu} = \text{uu} =$
 $\text{uu} = \text{uu} = \text{u} = \text{uu} = \text{u}$
 $\text{uuu} = \text{uu} = \text{u} = \text{uu} =$
 $\text{u} = \text{uu} = \text{u} = \text{uu} =$
 $= \text{uu} = \text{uuu} = \text{uu} =$
 $\text{uuu} = \text{uu} = \text{u} = \text{uu} =$
 $\text{uuu} = \text{uu} =$
 $\text{uu} = \text{uu} =$
 $\text{uu} = \text{uu} =$
 $\text{uuu} =$

ababababedddde,<sup>3</sup>

Lines 1 and 2 alliterate on f, lines 5 and 6 on h, lines 7 and 8 on t, line 9, 10, and 11 on w. The introduction of feminine rimes is worthy of remark.

Ex. 25. The Anturs of Arthur at the Tarnewathelan,<sup>4</sup> date about 1350,<sup>5</sup> Stanza 3.

$\text{uuu} = \text{uu} = \text{u} = \text{uu} = \text{u}$
 $\text{u} = \text{uu} = \text{u} = \text{uu} =$
 $\text{uu} = \text{uu} = \text{uuu} = \text{u} = \text{u}$
 $\text{u} = \text{uu} = \text{u} = \text{uu} =$
 $\text{uuu} = \text{uu} = \text{uuu} = \text{u} =$
 $\text{uuu} = \text{uu} = \text{u} = \text{uu} =$
 $\text{uuu} = \text{uuu} = \text{u} = \text{uuu} =$
 $\text{u} = \text{uuu} = \text{u} = \text{uu} =$
 $\text{uu} = \text{uuu} = \text{u} = \text{uu} =$
 $\text{u} = \text{uuu} =$
 $\text{uuu} = \text{uu} =$
 $\text{u} = \text{uuu} =$
 $\text{u} = \text{uuu} =$

ababababedddde.

<sup>1</sup> In the sixth line the two macrons after the caesura should be read as one long macron.

<sup>2</sup> Pinkerton, vol. 3, p. 69.

<sup>3</sup> Breve at end of seventh line.

<sup>4</sup> Robson.

<sup>5</sup> Given by Hohlfield, Anglia 11, p. 249, as on the authority of ten Brink.

Lines 1 and 2 alliterate on g, lines 3 and 4 on b, lines 5 and 6 on l, lines 8 and 9 on t, lines 12 and 13 on b.

So similar are examples 22, 23, and 24, that I do not hesitate to pronounce them products of the same school. Examples 23 and 24 were possibly by the same author, and written in the neighborhood of Carlisle.

It would seem, then, from the evidence of the stanza, that 1500 is too late for Gawan and Gologras, and 1350 a date much too early for the 'Anturs.'

Ex. 26. Of Saynt John the Euaungelist,<sup>1</sup> date about 1440.<sup>2</sup> Stanza 1.

|        |   |       |   |     |   |   |                              |
|--------|---|-------|---|-----|---|---|------------------------------|
| oo=ooo | = | "o    | = | oo  | = | } | a b a b a b a b e e d e e d. |
| ooo=   | = | oo "o | = | oo  | = |   |                              |
| =ooo   | = | oo"o  | = | ooo | = |   |                              |
| oo=oo  | = | "     | = | oo  | = |   |                              |
| =oo    | = | o"    | = | oo  | = |   |                              |
| o=oo   | = | o"o   | = | oo  | = |   |                              |
| oo=oo  | = | "oo   | = |     | = |   |                              |
| o=ooo  | = | "o    | = | oo  | = |   |                              |
| o=oo   | = |       | = |     | = |   |                              |
| o=oo   | = |       | = |     | = |   |                              |

Each alliteration is carried through two lines. The first short line recasts the thought of the last long line. It is impossible to determine with certainty whether these more corrupt forms are descendants of the septenar stanza, or are offshoots from the Southern stanzaic forms.

Ex. 27. Susanna,<sup>3</sup> date about 1360.<sup>4</sup> Stanza 1.

|         |   |            |   |     |   |   |                            |
|---------|---|------------|---|-----|---|---|----------------------------|
| ooo=ooo | = | "oo        | = |     | = | } | a b a b a b a b e d d e e. |
| ooo=    | = | o"o        | = | ooo | = |   |                            |
| ooo=oo  | = | "o         | = | oo  | = |   |                            |
| oo=oo   | = | "o         | = | oo  | = |   |                            |
| o=oo    | = | o "ooo     | = |     | = |   |                            |
| =o      | = | oooo       | = | o   | = |   |                            |
| o=oo    | = | o"o        | = | o   | = |   |                            |
| o=oo    | = | ooo o=oooo | = |     | = |   |                            |
| ooo=oo  | = |            | = |     | = |   |                            |
| oo=oo   | = |            | = |     | = |   |                            |

<sup>1</sup> E. E. T. S. No. 26.

<sup>2</sup> Schipper, vol. I, p. 230.

<sup>3</sup> Anglia, I, p. 93.

<sup>4</sup> Schipper, vol. I, p. 219, given on the authority of Horstmann.

<sup>5</sup> Insert a breve before last breve of sixth line.

This poem is assigned by Horstmann<sup>1</sup> to the Northern dialect, by Morris, as stated by Horstmann, to the West-Midland. The stanza is found in the Woodkirk plays in 'The Conspiracy' and 'The Ascension.' It is one of the favorite stanzas in the so-called Coventry cycle, occurring in the following plays—

- The Prologue,
- II. The Fall of Man,
- IV. Noah's Flood,
- X. Mary's Betrothment,
- XII. Joseph's Return,
- XVI. The Adoration by Shepherds,
- XXI. The Baptism of Christ,
- XXII. The Temptation.
- XXVI. The Entry into Jerusalem,
- XXVII. The Last Supper,
- XXIX. King Herod,
- XLI. The Assumption of the Virgin,
- XLII. Doomsday.

These Coventry plays are probably of East-Midland origin.<sup>2</sup> The same district appears to have been the locale of this stanza, which is found also in 'The Castell of Perseverance.'<sup>3</sup> It would appear, therefore, that the poem of Susanna should be assigned to a poet south of York, whose style was affected by Northern extravagances in alliteration.

The stanza was also of late date, since it passed into the Moralities.

From a fusion of the septenar stanza with this East-Midland stanza arose a new type with the following characteristics—

1. Alliteration in greatest excess.
2. So great an overplus of unstressed syllables that the recitation must have simulated chanting when the integrity of the stanza was preserved.
3. Surreptitious stress increased the accents to five and six in a line.
4. The rime of the East-Midland stanza was adopted.

This measure, with the reiteration of alliteration, was considered the proper introduction for persons of dignity, and is used in all four cycles, although the Ch and the Co soften greatly the alliteration. As the actor of royal rank usually appears at the beginning of the play, modification of the play in compliance with the taste of the period was an easy matter. This stanza, with various modifications, appears in York plays XXVIII, XXIX, XXX, XXXI, XXXIII, and stanzas or portions of stanzas, formed unmistakably upon the same verse pattern, are found in the Woodkirk, the so-called Coventry, and even in the Chester plays.

<sup>1</sup> Anglia, I, p. 93.

<sup>2</sup> Pollard, p. XXXVIII.

<sup>3</sup> Pollard, p. 64.

This stanza, as the earlier septenar, had a life history of change and deterioration. Sometimes the excessively long lines broke into two, with riming caesuras and the development of new stresses. Such verses, in process of resolution, exist in Pilate's speech in the Ch play, 'The Resurrection':

For I am prince pearles,
Most royal man of riches,
I may deale and I may dresse,
My name is Sir Pilate.

In these lines the alliteration has suffered injury, and the rime has been lost. They are a weak imitation, almost a prose version, of such lines as York XXXII:

For sir Pilate of pounce as prince am y prened
As renke most royall in richeste array—and the Woodkirk 'Flagellation':

Say, wote ye not that I am Pylate, perles to behold?

An earlier form of the same appears in W, 'Consp. & Captio':

Cayphas.

Syr Pilate, prince of mekylle price,
That prevyd is withoutten pere—which lines form the beginning of an a b a b a b a b c d c d stanza.

Furthermore, the bonds of rime were loosened, and sometimes the long lines passed towards the boundaries of rhythmical prose. This is illustrated by Y XXXI, "And drawe to no drofyng, but dresse you to drede, with dasshis," where "drede" rimes with the second line below, and "dasshis" with the fourth; also by Y XXXII, l. 10, where "To knawe" has no affiliation with the verse structure, and calls to mind similar versification in legends and romances.

Again, the breaking of stanzaic structure by the indefinite extension of the pedes of the stanza, as in Y XXXII, stanza 2; in Co XV, in Joseph's second speech; in Sir Gawain and The Green Knight, and elsewhere, led to the establishment of a species of verse, riming in most cases it is true, but with an irregular succession of stresses and tending toward a rhythmical prose. An investigation of the transformation and relationship of this stanza would yield rich results, but we must leave it as a task for others.

A fourth stanza invites our attention. In the French a simple 4-accent complot was popular at an early date.

Ex. 27.

In this measure were written the 'Roman de Brut' of Wace, the 'Roman de Rou,'<sup>1</sup> 'Guillaume D'Engleterre,' and many others. In English it is preserved in such ballads as 'A mery Ballet of the Hawthorne Tree,'<sup>2</sup> and in other styles of verse too familiar for reference.

These couplets were early fashioned into stanzas by the insertion of a short line, riming with the second couplet, and became popular in the 15th century with the French writers of Miracles. The stanza occurs repeatedly in 'Les Miracles de Notre Dame.'

Ex. 28.

This type probably gave rise to the English stanza—

Ex. 29.

but the method of riming is, regularly in English, the riming of similar verses, never in a succession of stanzas, as in French, by 'concatenatio.'<sup>3</sup>

This stanza is found in the Woodkirk plays as follows—

- I. Creation, the character of Deus.
- X. Annunciation, the play exclusive of Deus.
- XI. Mary and Elizabeth.
- XII. The Crucifixion, together with other stanzas.
- XXVIII. The Incredulity of Thomas, with other stanzas.

It is used also for the second part of 'Sir Ferumbras,'<sup>4</sup> for 'The Woman of Samaria,'<sup>5</sup> for Minot's 'Edward in Brabant,'<sup>6</sup> and elsewhere.

<sup>1</sup> Bartsch, col. 111, col. 143.

<sup>2</sup> Ritson, vol. 2, p. 44.

<sup>3</sup> Cp. Schipper in index.

<sup>4</sup> E. E. T. S. No. 34.

<sup>5</sup> E. E. T. S. No. 49, p. 84.

<sup>6</sup> Poems of Lawrence Minot, p. 13.

With the more difficult rime a a b a a b, this stanza occurs also in the Woodkirk plays—

VII. The Prophets.

IX. Caesar Augustus.

XXII. The Flagellation, in the part of the Tormentors.

Also in the Chester play, The Shepherds, among other stanzas.

This stanza is interesting as the germ of the metrical-romance stanza, which was possibly rejected by the writers of drama as too monotonous. The following partial lists will illustrate its use—a a b a a b e e b e e b.

Romance of Duke Rowlande and of Sir Ottuell of Spayne.<sup>1</sup> a a b a a b e e b d d b.

Amis and Amiloun,<sup>2</sup>

Libius Disconius,<sup>3</sup>

The King of Tars,<sup>3</sup>

Mary Legend, No. II.<sup>4</sup>

a a b e e b d d b e e b.

The Romance of Athelston,<sup>5</sup>

Emare.<sup>6</sup>

Romance of the Emporor Octavian,<sup>7</sup>

Erl of Tolous and the Emperes of Almayn,<sup>8</sup>

Le Bone Florence of Rome,<sup>9</sup>

Sir Isumbras.<sup>10</sup>

Rouland and Vernagu,<sup>11</sup>

Torrent of Portyngale,<sup>12</sup>

The Wright's Chaste Wife,<sup>13</sup>

Sir Amadace,<sup>14</sup> etc.

Certain other stanzas were of wide-spread use, and appear in the different cycles of Mystery Plays. Of their origin it is sufficient to say in general that they sprang, for the most part, from the Latin stanzaic forms of the church service, especially from the service of song. Some of them, also, show evident marks of French influence,

<sup>1</sup> E. E. T. S. No. 35.

<sup>2</sup> Kölbing, No. 2.

<sup>3</sup> Ancient English Metrical Romances.

<sup>4</sup> Horstmann, p. 503.—Note. Kölbing's criticism, Amis and Amiloun, p. XIV, of Horstmann's statement concerning the rime, is itself incorrect, as Horstmann speaks of the Mary Legend, No. II, but Kölbing of the Mary Legend, No. I.

<sup>5</sup> Relique Antiquæ, vol. I, p. 85.

<sup>6</sup> Ancient Metrical Romances, vol. 2.

<sup>7</sup> J. O. Halliwell.

<sup>8</sup> G. Lüdthe.

<sup>9</sup> Ancient English Metrical Romances.

<sup>10</sup> J. O. Halliwell.

<sup>11</sup> E. E. T. S. No. 39.

<sup>12</sup> E. E. T. S. Extra Series, No. 51.

<sup>13</sup> E. E. T. S. No. 14.

<sup>14</sup> Robson.

and it is probable that the sources of some are to be sought for in the Provençal. A general view, as exhaustive as seems necessary for our purpose, is appended. a a b a b. Ex. 30.

is found in six stanzas spoken by Lucifer, W I.

a a a b a b.

York VI, XXII, XXXVIII, XLII.

Woodkirk XIV, XXVII, XXXII, XXVI (in the part spoken by Jesus).

a a a b a a a b and a a a b c c c b.

Woodkirk XVII, XXIII (Mary's lament), XXIV (the Tormentors), XXIX (certain stanzas).

Coventry XIV (a portion of the play), XVI (stanzas by shepherds), XVII (stanzas by Magi, and certain 2-accent stanzas), XIX (one stanza), XXVII (by Judas in part), XXXII (by Jews and others), XXXIII, XXXIV (by Nychodemus), XXXV (in 4-accent and 2-accent verses), XXXVI (in part).

Chester. The whole Chester cycle was written by a poet who attempted to use the stanza  $a \overset{a}{a} b a \overset{a}{a} b$ , but frequently resorted to  $a \overset{a}{a} b c \overset{c}{c} b$  as an easier stanza, and sometimes lost his footing completely.

a a a a b c c c b.

Woodkirk III, XII, XIII, XVI, XX, XXI, XXII, XXIV (certain stanzas), XXX (in stanzas by demons).

Many modifications of these stanzas appear infrequently in the plays. We note in closing our review a favorite stanza of the Coventry plays, a b a b b c b c, from which it is but a step to Spenser.

Finally, we form from the foregoing examination of the stanzas of English in the mediæval period certain conclusions—

1. A distinctive stanza, formed from the septenar line, obtained in the district—to speak in general terms—extending from the Humber to the Forth; and was not used, except in a much altered form, outside of those limits.

2. The characteristics of this stanza were—

- a) Two 4-verse, 4-stress pedes; a 4-verse or 6-verse 3-stress cauda.
- b) The pedes rimed in two riming quatrains; the cauda originally rimed alternately, but variation was permissible.
- c) The verse kept carefully the iambic movement.

d) The caesura was uniformly placed after the second stress, exceptionally after the first and third.<sup>1</sup>

e) Caesuras and verses were masculine.

f) Alliteration was structural, i. e. confined to three stressed syllables in the verse.

3. This stanza suffered direct change in three ways—

a) By continual increase of alliteration.

b) Through the inordinate multiplication of unstressed syllables, especially in the first half-verses.

c) Through innovations in the riming of the cauda.

4. These changes were so pronounced in type and limited in time, that the stanza affords important evidence in dating poems relatively to each other.<sup>2</sup>

5. A stanza riming a b a b a b a b e d d d e was cultivated in East Anglia at a date somewhat later than that of the Northern stanza of pure type.

6. The Northern stanza, under the influence of the contiguous East Anglian stanza, formed a second distinct type.

7. This derived stanza developed as follows—

a) By the loosening of the bonds of stanzaic structure, the pedes were indefinitely extended, and the composition approached the bounds of rhythmical prose; or,

b) The voice failed to carry the excessive number of unstressed syllables, surreptitious stresses created a 5-stress line, or the verse broke into two lines with the development of new stresses.

8. A stanza a a b a a b e e b e e b was formed for rhythmical narrative, and became the vehicle of the metrical romance.

9. Other stanzas appear as directly dependent upon church sources and French influences.

10. A stanza a b a b b e b e closes the mediæval period. This statement applies more directly to the district immediately north of the Thames.

The cycles of Mystery plays present certain metrical characteristics as individual cycles—

1. The York cycle, with the exception of a few plays,<sup>3</sup> retains one stanzaic structure through a play, or, in some cases, through a scene.

2. The Woodkirk plays show an attempt to adapt the stanza to the character, or at least to limit the use of a given stanza to one character in a given play.

<sup>1</sup> Cp. Ex. 19.

<sup>2</sup> Cp. Ex. 24.

<sup>3</sup> Cp. York XII, XIII, XVI, XXIX, XXXI, XXXII, XL.

3. The Coventry plays exhibit prevailingly an interchange of three stanzas, the choice apparently influenced only by a desire for variety.

4. The Chester plays are, as uniformly as an author of limited poetical resources could make them, cast in the mold of one stanzaic form.

The importance of the foregoing conclusions in determining the structure of the cycles of plays is evident. We proceed now to the defense of certain propositions relating to the cycles themselves.

---

XX.

A SURVEY OF THE CYCLES OF MYSTERY PLAYS.

In considering the cycles of plays as wholes, certain general structural characteristics appear. A discussion of these will prepare us for a more minute investigation of cycle construction.

I. The York cycle contains plays of widely different styles and vocabulary. Such plays as X and XI have little in common with XXXI and XXXII, and still less with XLVI. The differences are not such as arise from an unskillful re-working of an old play. Such scribal changes are found in Woodkirk 'Pharao,' when compared with York XI. They lead to the distortion of the stanza—

a) By the insertion of extra-stanzaic verses, as the quatrain in W after the first stanza, or the two verses separating the cauda from the pedes in stanza 22.

b) By the breaking of rime, as in stanza 25.

c) By the disarrangement or obliteration of the alliteration through the displacement of alliterative words by non-alliterative synonyms, as through the substitution of 'words' for 'saws' in l. 17, or by the complete loss of alliteration in l. 23.

d) By the destruction of the iambic movement, as in lines 21, 39, 52, 53, etc.

e) By the loss of a stress, as in line 28.

The differences between the above-named plays are not of this character, but fundamental. They concern—

a) The structure of the line, which in XXXI and XXXII is excessive in alliteration, inordinate in length, irregular in rime, and contains occasionally an unusual tag, as line 10, XXXII.

b) The riming, as in XLVI, where the repetition of 'hym,' 'us,' and the frequent use of words ending in 'ioun' is a habit unknown to the author of X and XI.

c) The vocabulary of the writer, in cases where there is no question of the substitution of a more familiar synonym. Examples of such usage are 'bewseheris' and many quasi-French words (cp. line 257, XXXI), and the employment of words of Latin origin which were used in riming as an ornament of style, especially such as end in 'ioun.'

These affectations in riming we recognize, from later plays and from other poetical works, as the ornaments of style at a period later than the origin of plays X and XI.

The municipal books of York show that expansion or contraction of the cycle, according to the present needs of the different crafts,<sup>1</sup> was of common occurrence. Such changes were made by the insertion or excision of whole scenes, or of whole plays, never by the fusion of plays. This will become clear as we proceed to the more minute analysis.

II. The Woodkirk cycle<sup>2</sup> is a collection of plays drawn from various sources. The compiler was a man of small poetical ability. His original verse was confined to couplets, with an occasional attempt at quatrains. He did not hesitate to appropriate good work wherever he found it, or to do violence to rhyme or measure, if he considered the thought unclear or contrary to accepted traditions.

As illustrations of his methods we cite—

1. For transition between selected parts of plays, the sixteen verses by cherubim between the first speech of Deus and that of

<sup>1</sup> York plays, pp. XIV to XXVI, notes.

<sup>2</sup> Hall, Englische Studien, vol. 9, p. 449, argues that Y is derived from W because it contains more alliteration! He arrives at this conclusion by trusting implicitly to Skeat's "Law of progress in alliterative poetry." Preface to Joseph of Arimathea, p. X. If, as Skeat formulates it, the progress is "from lines with two alliterated letters to lines with three, and in very late instances, to lines with four," from irregularity to regularity—although he admits that some of the latest examples of alliterative verse relapses into irregularity;—"then I do not see how Hall's conclusion can be escaped. But the law seems to run as well from no alliteration to two alliterated words. In that case the re-creation of the old alliteration after the literature containing it had been buried for centuries would be little short of a miracle.

On the contrary, the old laws of alliteration were preserved by the North in continuous tradition. A sharp division must be made between structural alliteration, which conforms to ancient law, and alliteration for ornament, which gradually broke down the tradition of the fathers by swamping the essentials in a multitude of detail. We have already traced the progress of demoralization, and need only note that it, in conformity with other evidences, makes W the later dependent cycle so far as concerns the older plays of the collection.

Lucifer in Creatio. These couplets seem to be a condensation of some unknown play.

2. For introduction, the four couplets introducing the call of Deus, "Abraham, Abraham," in the play of Abraham.

3. For expansion of thought or to convey indirectly a lesson, many quatrains—sometimes only three verses—that are usually introduced between stanzas, as in 'Pharao' after l. 13,<sup>1</sup> l. 108, l. 120; in 'Pagina Doctorum' after l. 173, l. 174, l. 175.

4. For plays of transition where the compiler desired that certain incidents of the Bible should be made prominent, and could find no suitable play, the drama of Isaac—Isaac blessing Jacob—and that of Jacob—when Jacob was named Israel.

5. For plays that are formed from two or more plays by the use of selected stanzas or parts of stanzas, 'Flagellacio' and 'Extractio Animarum.' To this compiler, however, we are indebted for the preservation of the second 'Shepherd Play,' our earliest farce, and for the 'Judicium,' which, in the part of Tutivillus,<sup>2</sup> contains a satire on the fashions and manners of the day.

III. The Chester plays are, as Hohlfeld has well said, the work of a translator.<sup>3</sup> I incline, however, to the opinion that the cycle was not French, but Anglo-Norman. The agreements with the other cycles are significant. They include—

1. 'The Salutation,' which shows agreement among Ch, Y, W, and S & T of Co.

2. 'The Purification,' which shows agreement among Ch, Y, W, and W of Co.

3. The Song of Jesus, where there is agreement between Ch and W.

4. In 'Christ Betrayed' the agreement between Ch and W in two lines accompanying the stroke of the sword.

To these may be added the distinctively English passages—

1. The gossips' song, Ch I, p. 53.

2. The part of Mulier, Ch II, p. 81.

It may be admitted that the Song of Jesus and the gossips' song are later additions, that 'The Purification' is an adaptation of the York play; still, 'The Salutation' is in the stanza of the cycle and probably by the same translator; therefore not all of these agreements arose from the late adoption of plays from other cycles.

<sup>1</sup> The verse-numbers apply to the corresponding York play.

<sup>2</sup> Cp. Tuteville in Rodentiner Osterspiel, pp. 49, 50. The coincidence appears to arise by independent derivation from 'toute-vilain.'

<sup>3</sup> Anglia, vol. II.

The wide agreement in these plays seems to me to argue a common knowledge of models existing in England. These models may have been in part Anglo-Norman, as the cycle of the Parish Clerks of London probably was. Most of them were undoubtedly church plays, would be often in Latin, possibly sometimes in Anglo-Norman, and often in English.<sup>1</sup>

The continual presence of plays in the churches upon appropriate festival days must be assumed. Few remains of such plays are extant, but the known opposition of the reforming party to these plays, and the efficient zeal of King Henry's spoilers, would satisfactorily account for their destruction with the dispersion of libraries that were their proper repositories. The repeated enactment of imperative laws<sup>2</sup> forbidding plays in the churches, the presence of sepulchres in many churches to-day, and the occasional references to them in hostile writings,<sup>3</sup> are conclusive evidences of their presence.

A mistaken interpretation of phenomena presented by the plays has often arisen through the failure to give due weight to two facts that concern the church customs of that day. It may be well to interrupt for a moment the course of this discussion to present those facts.

First, the solidarity of custom, as well as of belief, throughout the churches of England and France. This gave rise to a uniformity of method and expression in the mystery plays, which resulted in such striking similarities between plays formed on models used in the churches of England and those that arose from other models on the continent, that oftentimes direct dependence of the English play upon the French has been asserted, when, very possibly, each author knew no plays but those of his own cathedral church and immediate neighborhood. Churches are conservative bodies, slow to change their customs; therefore the church plays would diverge from their common type very slowly. They were viewed almost as parts of the liturgy.

<sup>1</sup> See the 'Mystery of the Burial of Christ,' 'Off the Weeping of the Three Maries,' and the 'Mystery of the Resurrection,' given in Wright's Reliquie Antiques, vol. I, pp. 124-161. These are English church mysteries, which have been passed by without remark by writers upon this subject.

<sup>2</sup> The chief trace that the old hierarchy left of its dramatic existence was the acting of plays in the churches, which was finally ordered to be discontinued by proclamation in 1542, but was continued by choristers of St. Paul and of the Chapel Royal until the time of Chas. I.—Hone, p. 220. In 1603, canon 88 of the canons of the Church of England enacted that church-wardens should not suffer plays in churches, chapels, or churchyards.—Encyclopædia Britannica s. v. Theatre.

<sup>3</sup> 'The Beehive of the Romish Church' speaks of the shows of Burial, Resurrection, etc.—Hone, p. 221.

Secondly, if the tradition was preserved through acted church plays rather than through the importation and re-casting of texts, the agreement between plays will be different in kind. The correspondence arising through the remodeling of plays we can study in the Woodkirk cycle, when compared with the York. They are found throughout the body of the text, usually in whole stanzas or in considerable portions of stanzas, wherever the thought seemed pleasing to the compiler. The agreements, arising from the recollection of the play as acted, will lie in certain notable actions that are conventionally present in every church play, and in the appropriate speech that goes with such action.

A few examples, drawn from French and Italian sources, and placed in comparison with the English plays, will illustrate my position.

In J,<sup>1</sup> p. 5, Dieu takes Adam and Eve by the hand and tells them of the tree.

In V T,<sup>2</sup> vol. 1, p. 34, Dieu takes Adam and Eve by the hand, pronounces benediction of marriage, and shows them the tree.

In W, p. 6, Cherubyn takes Adam by the hand and the Lord speaks about the tree.

In Ch, vol. 1, p. 24, God takes Adam by the hand after the discourse and causes him to lie down.<sup>3</sup>

Eve's address to Adam when offering him the apple—

In J, p. 8, Adam, chier compains et amis.

In Ch, vol. 1, p. 28, Adam, husbände, life and deare.

In Co, p. 28, My semely spouse and good husband.

In W the play is lost.

Adam eats—exclaims, then a) accuses Eve, or b) perceives nakedness, or c) combines the two.

In J, p. 9, Ha hay ! je suy mal avoiez.

Ce moreel ne puis avaler.

In V T I, p. 49, O vray Dieu, de moy te souviennne !

Poore maleureux, que ay je fait ?

In Y, p. 25, Allas ! what hane I done, for shame !

Ille counsaile woo worthe the !

A ! Eve, þou art to blame.

<sup>1</sup> J stands for Mystères inédits par Achille Jubinal.

<sup>2</sup> V T stands for Viel Testament.

<sup>3</sup> A similarity here with V T leads to the supposition that God also led Adam into Paradise and showed him the tree.

In Ch I, p. 29,      Out ! alas ! what aylith me ?

I am nacked well I see ;

Woman, cursed moth thou be,

In Co, p. 27,      Alas ! alas ! ffor this fals dede,

My flesly frend my fo I fynde,

Schameful synne doth us unhede,

I se us nakyd before and behynde.

In W the play is lost.

The exclamations of devils in torment—

In J, p. 24, Belgibuz,—Haron, je suis tout forsonnez.

In V. T, vol. 1, p. 18, Lucifer,—Harau, Harau ! je me repens.

In Y, p. 5, Lucifer,—Owte, owte ! harrowe ! helples, slyke hote at<sup>1</sup> es here.

In W, p. 4, Demon,—Alas, alas, and wele-wo !

In N,<sup>2</sup> Diabolus,—Put off Harro, and well away.

In Ch, vol. 1, p. 17, Demon,—Out ! harrowe ! wher is our mighte.

The salutation—

In J, Gabriel —      Ave Maria gratia plena.

Marie, Dieu te sault, Marie.

In D,<sup>3</sup> vol. 1, p. 188, Gabbriello,— Salviti Dio, che se<sup>3</sup> di grazia piena :

Teco si trova il gran Signore Dio.

In Y, p. 98, Angel—Hayle ! Marie ! full of grace and blysse, Oure lord god is with þe.

In W, p. 74, Gabriel—

Haylle, Mary, and welle thou be,

My lord of heven is wyth the.

In Ch, vol. 1, p. 94, Gabriell—

Heale be thou, Marye, mother ffree,

Full of grace, God is with thee.

In Co, p. 112, Gabriel—

Ave Maria gratia plena, Dominus tecum !

Heyl, fful of grace, God is with the.

Mary's consent —

In J, p. 50,      Ainssy soit fait com tu me dis.

In D, vol. 1 p. 189, Ecco l'Ancilla del Signore Dio :

Sia fatto a me secondo il tuo dir pio.<sup>4</sup>

<sup>1</sup> The use of the pronoun 'at' shows the expression to be old, otherwise the scribe would have changed it as elsewhere. The evident introduction of 'helples' to alliterate with 'harrowe' shows that the favorite expletive was considered necessary.

<sup>2</sup> N stands for Noah's Ark, Newcastle-on-Tyne, Sharp's Diss, p. 224.

<sup>3</sup> D stands for A. D'Ancona, Sacre Rappresentazioni.

<sup>4</sup> See the extract of the church service on p. 179 of the same work.

- In Y, p. 99,           Goddis handmayden, lo ! me here,
                               To his wille all redy grayd.
 In W, p. 75.           I am his madyn at his hand.
 In Ch, vol. 1, p. 35,   Loc ! Godes cossen meklye here.
 In Co, p. 114,         Se here the hand-mayden of oure Lorde, Aftyr thi worde be it don to me.

The stage direction—

- In J, p. 50, Cy descende 1 coulom qui soit fait par bonne manière.
 In D, p. 189, Allora lo Spirito Santo discende sopra di lei, ed in cielo si fa grandissima festa, e l'Angelo ritorna in cielo.
 In Co, p. 114.       Here the Holy Gost descendit with iij. bemys to our Lady, the sone of the Godhed vest with iij.
                               bemys to the Holy Gost, the fadyr Godly with iij.
                               bemys to the sone, and so entre alle thre to her bosom, and Mary seyth.

It is absurd to suppose, because of the above coincidences, that the writer of each English play had the Italian and French plays before him. The Bible narrative was familiar to each writer. This sometimes necessitates the action, sometimes the language seems the natural outcome of the situation ; both reasons would operate as conservative agents to prevent change in the church play. I think one is forced to admit that there must have been a uniformity of action and of expressions closely connected with action, in the important situations in church plays, similar to that obtaining in the liturgy itself, and that, in many instances, the agreements of plays in short passages and in the sequence of action is due to the essential identity of the church models from which these plays sprang.

But further, if it can be shown that the action of the Chester plays agrees with the action of other English plays at points where all or several disagree in action or accompanying words with the continental plays, a divergence of the English church plays from the customs of the continent will be established, and the Chester plays will fall into the category of English plays, though in the Anglo-Norman tongue.

Unfortunately, the French texts necessary for the settlement of this question are not accessible to me. I can simply contribute one item, and must pass on to other matters. A significant agreement between Ch and W may be a case in point. I refer to Peter's speech after cutting off the ear of Malchus,—

In Ch, vol. 2, p. 31, Goe nowe to Cayphas,
   And byde hym doe the righte.
 In W, p. 188,               Go pleyn the to Sir Cayphas,
   And byd hym do the right.

The language in Y and in J is different, although the situation is the same. We return now to the discussion of the cycles.

IV. — The so-called Coventry plays are, I think, the work of one author. They are of late date, I should say of the early part of the sixteenth century. They have little or no direct dependence upon the other cycles. It has been shown as probable that they were written in the northern part of East Anglia.

I am reluctant to advance a theory for their origin, since I cannot offer sufficient confirmatory data, but I would suggest that they may be the work of some author connected with one of the great religious houses of the Fen District. These plays appear to me to rest upon church plays that have received their development at the hands of those closely connected with the ceremonial of religious life.

It might be expected that plays, made in such a house for the instruction and diversion of rusties, would emphasize the homiletic element, and would draw largely upon the Apocrypha.<sup>1</sup> The frequent intrusion of Latin with explanatory verses was also a characteristic of church plays. The stanzas of dimeters, pp. 159, 164, 180, 348, 353, simulate the Latin hymns of the Christmas time and of the Resurrection service. A certain restraint pervades the plays, very different from the spontaneity of the York and Woodkirk plays.

It would seem that these plays were recast by one writer into cyclic form. The fragmentary condition of many stanzas may arise in part from imperfect re-working of the material; but this conclusion cannot be drawn with confidence, since at this date the alternation of stanzaic schemes within a single play or poem seems oftentimes to have been favored for the sake of variety. I have nothing to offer concerning the indications that the cycle was in the hands of a traveling troupe, monkish or otherwise.

V. The craft plays of Coventry were in close connection with the York and Woodkirk cycles, as is proved by the dependence of the Weavers' play of Coventry and the 'Pagina Doctorum' of Woodkirk upon York XX. A common source must, I think, be postulated for the Coventry 'Nativity,' the Chester 'Salutation,' and the York XII.

<sup>1</sup> For Apocryphal agreements in 'The Barrenness of Anna,' 'Mary in the Temple,' 'Mary's Betrothment,' etc., see Hone.

Whether this source is an earlier play, or whether each is independently based upon Lake, Chap. I, will be the theme of a later chapter.<sup>1</sup>

VI. The cycle of Newcastle-on-Tyne has disappeared, except the play of Noah's Ark. This play has been grievously modernized, to the destruction of the stanzaic structure. Here and there a semblance of the original stanza can yet be detected and the stanza restored, but such instances are rare.

Noah Respondit.

Even wo worth thou fouled sin,
For all too dear thou must be bought,
God for thanks he made mankind,
Or with his hands that he them wrought:
Therefore or ever you blind,
You mind your wife and turn your thought,
For of my work I will begin,
So well were me all forth brought.

Y IX, stanza 12, contains the rime series—'synne,' 'blynne,' 'mankynne,' 'wynne,' which enables us to restore the above rimes, 'sin' = 'synne,' 'mankind' = 'mankynne,' 'blind' = 'blynne,' and thus to restore the sense of the fifth line. This is then a double quatrain stanza, or the pedes of a Northern septenar stanza, possibly similar to Y IX.

Other changes also are necessary. An improved reading for the first line would be—

Ever wo worth the fouled synne.

In the words, 'for thanks,' one fails to detect the verb 'vorþence,'<sup>2</sup> 'forthinke,'<sup>3</sup> meaning 'repents.'

Other portions of the play were, without much doubt, written in another stanza. This, then, is a play with two or more stanza forms; probably a pieced play like some of those in W. The introduction of Deabolus is foreign to other known English plays, apparently, and indicates French influence, as does the stationary play-field of Newcastle. More than this we cannot determine from the scanty and corrupt remains of the Newcastle cycle.

From this cursory view of the cycles, we return now to the York cycle, to question it in regard to the interdependence of its different plays.

<sup>1</sup> See Chap. XXIV.

<sup>2</sup> Stratmann.

<sup>3</sup> Halliwell.

XXI.

THE PARENT CYCLE OF THE YORK MYSTERY PLAYS.

As we have seen in the preceding chapter, the existing York cycle is a compilation, containing plays of very different styles and stanzaic structure. In the earlier discussion of the life history of the Northern septenar stanza, it became evident that this stanza passed through well-defined phases, of which one phase at a time dominated the writers of its day. Therefore, since the different life stages of this stanza are found in the present York cycle, it becomes possible to date the plays relatively to each other by their stanzaic structure.

The earliest form of the stanza found in the York plays—a structure showing already marked evidence of deterioration—is the stanza of plays II, X, XI, XXIII, XXIV, XXVII, XXXV, XXXVII, XLIV, and portions of XII, XV, XVII. This stanza is also found in a part of Woodkirk play XX, which has no correspondent in York. These plays are therefore older than York plays XXVIII, XXIX, XXX, XXXI, XXXII, which exhibit the stanza at a much later stage of its development.

The questions that immediately confront us are two: first, do these plays represent an earliest cycle, which has been extended at later and different periods by additions from one or more sources? and, secondly, are these plays the work of one author? These questions merit a careful investigation.

As regards the first question, it can be affirmed—

1. That these plays are certainly older than the remainder of the York plays, with the possible exception of a few plays of, as it would seem, church origin.
2. That they are the only plays of the York cycle, having a common stanza, that could possibly form a cycle.
3. That they are older than the Woodkirk, true Coventry, and so-called Coventry cycles.

The first point is proved by the stanzaic structure, which excludes all competitors, except for those stanzas directly dependent upon church or French influence.<sup>1</sup> The second position rests upon the fact that these plays include the Creation, Abraham and Isaac, the Christmas Cycle, the Crucifixion, and the Harrowing of Hell, the leading plays of every possible extended cycle. The third point requires further demonstration.

<sup>1</sup> See point 9, p. 127.

These plays are older than the Woodkirk and true Coventry cycles, because both W and Co borrowed from the York, though not from the extant text of the York. Since the text is a variant of the present York, it is probable that the borrowing was prior to the registration of the play. It is reasonable to suppose that actors' copies were collated with the registered play after the authoritative copy was in existence.

The relationship of author's MS., registered play, and actor's copy must be finally made out for each play, even—where there has been patchwork—for each scene separately. It is sufficient for our purpose here to state that, in many places, a text better than the present York can be established by the readings of the other cycles; therefore, in those plays at least, the borrowing was earlier than the registration.

Moreover, in plays of the early septenar stanza, W and Co borrowed from Y, not Y and these from a common original. The proof of this lies—

1. In the stanza, which does not occur without variation outside of the parent cycle.
2. In the evidence of damage suffered by the stanza at the hands of redactors, which is serious in W and Co, and but slight in Y.
3. In the fact that W pieces plays of Y with stanzas from other plays; see Y XXXVII.

As regards the question of authorship, I am of the opinion that the parent York cycle was the work of one author. This opinion rests upon characteristics of phraseology, riming words, style of treatment, uniformity of verse movement, caesura, and general rhythm in stanzas—matters that must be elucidated in extenso.

We conclude, then,—

1. That there was a parent cycle of plays at York.
2. That W and the true Co borrowed certain plays from this cycle.
3. That this cycle was the work of one author.

What, then, were the plays that formed this earliest cycle? My hypotheses are that it contained—

1. All the plays of the characteristic stanza.
2. Y VIII and IX as well.
3. Also W, 'Conspiracio' from "Cayphas" to "Tune diect Sanctus Johannes."

The evidence in favor of the admission of Y VIII and Y IX to the cycle will be considered first.

In Y IX the stanza departs from the standard in the cauda. The typical cauda is a quatrain; the cauda of IX is a sestet, riming e d e e c d. To my mind this riming series shows Southern influence. However, in every other particular,—alliteration, verse movement, caesura, the agreement with X and XI is very marked. How much this may mean we see by comparing the stanza schemes of X, stanza 1;<sup>1</sup> IX, stanza 1;<sup>2</sup> and XXVI, stanza 4.<sup>3</sup>

It is well to remember that this Y XXVI is the play to which W 'Conspiracio' answers, and, as we hope to prove later, supplanted the earlier play of the York cycle, as being more in accord with the later taste.

The differences between these stanzas of IX and XXVI are more important than is the single circumstance of agreement in rime. They are the differences in alliteration and verse-movement that mark the degeneration of the stanza. XXVI is later than IX, and has its connections with XXX, XXXI, and the remainder of a small group of plays, of which the first supplanted the old 'Conspiracy,' and the rest presented the trials and various incidents prior to 'Christ led up to Calvary.' This whole group, through style, verse-movement, and disorganization of stanza, reveals interesting affiliations with the so-called Co, and with certain plays of W.<sup>4</sup>

In Y VIII the stanza is equivalent to the pedes of IX. It would be nothing surprising if an author who was experimenting with the cauda of his favorite stanza should try the experiment of dropping it altogether. The York cycle, however, contains another play in this double quatrain measure, play XXXIX, for the second stanza of which the following scheme can be formed—

This scheme is very different from that of XXVI. The verse-movement and alliteration agree well with those of VIII and IX, but the language seems of a later date.

It is well to remember that this was a favorite stanza for the four-accent verse that sprang from the iambic tetrameter of the Latin,

<sup>1</sup> See p. 116.

<sup>2</sup> See p. 118.

<sup>3</sup> See p. 118.

<sup>4</sup> See p. 127.

and was widely cultivated in Southern England through French influence. In this verse alliteration was never structural, but, especially on the borders of the Northern district, simulated structural alliteration so closely at times, that other tests must be relied upon to detect the affiliations of the verse. In this case the tests will be those that would reveal a common authorship.

In the poems of this stanza the riming series and the riming words are important indications of authorship. In each typical stanza there must be four rimes, of which two must contain a series of four words each. Redactors may distort the stanza and modernize, or translate into another dialect, the riming words; still, so much of the original riming system will remain intact that restoration is commonly a comparatively simple task.

Furthermore, the riming series were few, and the number of words of one rime was limited. The poets were so closely bound by the fetters of their stanza that a new riming series of six words was a discovery of prime importance, and the changes were rung in series of four almost to the limits of possible permutations.

This test, then, of a riming series and of the words that form such a series is easy of application, and would afford a ready solution of the problem of authorship, were it not for the remarkable uniformity in these series as used by different writers. Here lies a serious difficulty. Certain riming series were common to all writers of English for centuries, if, indeed, they are not now employed by the authors of hymns. Such are the rimes upon 'be,' 'here,' 'will,' 'noght,' 'land,' etc. Other correspondences were confined to certain poems in common with the York cycle; thus the Northern Gospel of Nicodemus shows such agreements with the plays of the early septenar stanza that one is led to suspect the existence of a school of poetry<sup>1</sup> with headquarters at York, but with disciples throughout the North, and continuing through several steps of stanzaic change.

The necessity of a division of riming series into three classes becomes, therefore, apparent. These classes are formed of—

1. Those series that were used by all writers of Middle English verse with masculine rimes.
2. Those series that seem to mark a common tradition among certain poets working in a somewhat similar manner.
3. Those series that appear to arise from the individual choice of the author.

---

<sup>1</sup> This subject merits a special investigation.

Our present search is concerned with the third division only, although the recognition of the other categories will aid us in the interpretation of the data obtained.

For these rime tests I have selected Y X, as a play undoubtedly belonging to the parent cycle; Y IX, the one whose authorship is in question because of the irregular cauda; Y VIII, one in a different stanza through loss of the cauda; and Y XXXIX, one agreeing in every particular, so far as it has yet been examined, with VIII. As a measure for the plays I take Y XI, which is unquestionably of the parent cycle.

XI agrees with X and with no other in rime series upon 'wiste,' 'fell,' 'name,' 'wise,' 'fayle,' 'said,' and 'kepe.'

The identical rimes among these are—kepe, schepe, X, 26, XI, 8.

same, hame, name, blame, X, 4.
same, hame, blame, name, X, 31.
wise, saeryfice, X, 7 and X, 19.

The included rimes are—fell, telle, X, 17.

telle, fell, emell, Isrell, XI, 3. dwelle, telle, XI, 9.
tell, Isrell, dwell, emell, XI, 16.
tell, Isrell, bell, dwelle, XI, 18.
name, same, XI, 20.
name, blame, same, shame, XI, 15.
same, hame, name, blame, X, 4.
same, hame, blame, name, X, 31.
saide, grathide, X, 13.
grathid, brayde, saide, payed, X, 16.
saide, paied, XI, 30.

These rime series number 24.

XI contains 63 different varieties of rime.

X contains 47 different varieties of rime.

The rime series of XI number 134.

The rime series of X number 129.

The agreeing rime series constitute 12/134 of all in XI, and 12/129 of all in X.

The riming words agreeing number 14 in 406 lines of XI, and in 380 lines of X, or 1 in 27 lines of X.

XI agrees with IX and with no other in rime series upon 'before,' 'men,' 'borne,' 'flitte,' 'mene,' 'greve,' 'enresse,' and 'marre.'

Identical rimes among these are—wore, before, sore, (no) more, IX, 20. before, wore, sore, more, XI, 23.

sesse, enresse, IX, 17.
sesse, enresse, XI, 4.

Included rimes are—

wene, mene, IX, 5.
mene, scene, grene, wene, XI, 9.
greve, myscheue, IX, 8.
meve, greve, leve, myscheue, XI, 24.
sesse, enresse, IX, 17 and XI, 4.
pees, press, sces, encrese, XI, 2.
pees, sesse, messe, enresse, XI, 14.

This table reveals a closer agreement between IX and XI than between X and XI, yet X and XI have the same stanzaic structure. It establishes the connection of VIII with the cycle, since VIII ranks with X in agreement with XI, and indeed ranks above X, when we consider that VIII is confined to four-word series, as it has no cauda, and that this author appears to express his preferences, so far as they depart from the literary conventions of his day, more often in the two-word series of the double quatrain. It sharply separates XXXIX from VIII. That this division is not the result of accident is further demonstrated by the behavior of XXXIX in combination. The common rimes of VIII, IX, and X agree with XI in one rime in four, but the common rimes of XXXIX, and IX and X, agree with XI in only one rime in nine.

In accordance with these results, we conclude that VIII and IX belong to the cycle, and that XXXIX does not. As a confirmatory fact, we note that the subjects of plays VIII and IX are interdependent. If one play belongs in the cycle, the other must go with it.

The third hypothesis must now be considered. Is W 'Conspiracio' from "Cayphas" to "Tunc dicet Sanctus Johannes" the work of the author of the York cycle?

This question should admit of an answer through the rime tests employed in the preceding investigation. It is not necessary to give the steps in detail. The results obtained for comparison with those of the table are 8, 31, 16, and 1 in 18 lines, a confirmatory result.

Let us beware, however, of accepting these tests as absolutely conclusive of single authorship. They do seem to establish a common membership in a parent cycle, to separate the work of one age from that of another, but the distinguishing of individual authorship within a school of literature is a very different matter. The number of rime series known to the Northern writers was limited. Individual preferences had but little freedom. A similar test made upon the first four hundred lines of the Northern Evangelium Nicodemi gives nearly as favorable an answer for single authorship; yet it seems almost certain that this poem is by a different author of the same school, probably of a slightly earlier date.

The poet of the Nicodemus was individual in his use of riming plurals, 'dedes,' 'lawes,' of rimes upon 'now,' 'stout,' 'house,' for his fondness for certain series, 'Cayphas,' 'pas,' 'was,' 'Pilate,' 'gate.' The latter he uses seven times out of eleven rimes on 'gate,' although the rime itself is found in none of the plays examined excepting once in XI. In these details, meagre it is true, and of little value in the days of literary liberty, but significant when they appear in work that knew no innovations, one comes to feel that here is a personality, seeking expression that shall not be an echo.

Through a like scrutiny the literary workmanship of these plays reveals to the mind of the investigator evidences of unity of treatment that, to my mind, are worth far more than rime tests.

Again, these results from rime tests must be received with caution for two additional reasons; first, because the text needs thorough emendation, and the quality of the riming sounds must be established by wide comparisons, together with the careful definition of sub-dialects, before we can form our categories with confidence; and, secondly, because the classification of data has not been extended over a sufficiently wide area to admit of safe generalization. These are tasks for many scholars. My purpose is accomplished, if my data are sufficiently accurate to establish the unity of the parent cycle. To that extent I believe them trustworthy, and also that, taken in conjunction with many rather intangible stylistic evidences, they form a reasonable basis for belief in a single authorship.

Let us see, then, what plays constitute this parent cycle. The list<sup>1</sup> is as follows—

The Parent Cycle.

- Y II, The Creation, to the fifth day.
- Y VIII, The Building of the Ark.
- Y IX, Noah and his Wife, the Flood and its waning.
- Y X, Abraham's Sacrifice of Isaac.
- Y XI, The Departure of the Israelites from Egypt, the Ten Plagues, and the Passage of the Red Sea.
- Y XII, The Annunciation, The Prologue.
- Y XV, The Angels and the Shepherds.—The first three stanzas and the last four, omitting the comic episode.
- Y XVII, The Coming of the Three Kings to Herod; the Adoration.—The Salutation, stanzas 22, 23, 24, has perhaps been reworked, or may have been written in accordance with established custom. Salutations of similar style appear elsewhere in mediæval poetry.
- Y XX, Christ with the Doctors in the Temple.
- Y XXIII, The Transfiguration.
- Y XXIV, The Woman taken in Adultery. The Raising of Lazarus.

<sup>1</sup> Cp. Hohlfeld in Anglia II, p. 248.

W XX, Conspiracio—From “Cayphas” to “Tune diæt Sanctus Johannes.” Supplanted in York.

Y XXVII, The Last Supper.

Y XXXV, Crucifixio Christi.

Y XXXVII, The Harrowing of Hell.

Y XLIV, The Descent of the Holy Spirit.

Concerning the above plays a few remarks are necessary. Y II is a monologue. Y III is like it in verse movement, rimes, and stylistic peculiarities, but is written in quatrains. Y II cannot stand alone. There must have been either a continuation, that rehearsed the creation of Adam and Eve, and was superseded by Y III, or Y III must have been in the parent cycle.

Y III has been transcribed repeatedly. Two copies of it stand in the Register.<sup>1</sup> It has been greatly modernized by a scribe of Southern proclivities. ‘Sall’ occurs 24 times in Y II, ‘schall’ not at all; ‘schall’ occurs 19 times in Y III, ‘sall’ not at all. ‘I’ is found 28 times in Y II, ‘y’ not at all; ‘I’ is found 12 times in Y III, ‘y’ occurs 6 times. The rimes agree sufficiently well. Y II has 32 varieties of rime; Y III, 28 varieties. The two plays agree in 15 rimes.

If we knew more of the method of presentation, we might be able to judge better of the relationship of these two plays. Y II is a monologue. I suspect that it was largely explanatory of a picture pageant carried upon the pageant wagon. Perhaps the pictures were successively exposed to view, as different portions of the world were created. The parallel to the pageants of royal entry with one speaker, who explained the tableau, is sufficient.

In Y III, it would seem that the tableau stood fully formed. The speaker points to each part as he says—

In heuen ar aungels faire and bright,
Sternes and planetis per courses to goo,
þe mone serues vnto þe nyghte,
The sonne to lighte þe day also.

In erthe is trees, and gresse to springe,
Beestes and fowles, bothe grete and smale,
Fisshys in flode, all other thyng,
Thryffe and haue my blissynge alle.

But the words of Adam and Eve appear to me conventional, as bearing marked traces of the church play. Y III may be an old church play that has supplanted the original play of the cycle.

<sup>1</sup> York Plays, p. 14.

There survives a curious proof that there was a Northern play on this theme, and in the characteristic stanza. On the margin of the MS. are written, as following line 44, these lines<sup>1</sup>—

And leyd your lyves in good degre, Adam here make I the
a man of mykyll myght.
Thys same shall thy subget be
And Eve her name shall hight.

These lines form the cauda of a stanza, together with the last verse of the preceding pedes. They are in an Elizabethan hand, and must be a quotation from some play then extant. Can it have been the Beverly play? In any case it establishes the existence of such a play, and reinforces the hypothesis that the play of the parent cycle had been supplanted by a church play of an early type. The problem must be left for the present unsolved.

Y XI closes with a song, W adds a tribute of praise.

In Y XII, the prologue only belongs to the work of our author. Whether the remainder of his play has given place to a later play, or whether he took a popular play, wrote a prologue for it, and put it into his cycle, is a question to be determined with the examination of all the plays that are paraphrases of Luke I. This will be the theme of a later chapter.

The author of this cycle did not utilize the comic episodes. As the plays departed further from the church play, the dramatic element became more prominent, and a literary convention called for some humorous remarks about the angels' singing. This episode was then inserted, probably with little excision.

Y XX will be given a special examination in connection with the plays derived from it.

Y XXIV has lost a leaf at a very important action. Jesus has evidently written on the ground the sins of the accusers, wherein the play agrees with the theological notions of the day.<sup>2</sup>

W XX begins with the introduction of Pilate, with verse movement after the later fashion. The differences between the earlier and later styles are well exemplified in the stanzas assigned to Pilate and Caiaphas at the beginning of the play. The later part of this play is in a different style, and covers the incidents of the Last Supper, as does Y XXVII. The speech of Jesus is a paraphrase of portions of the Gospel of John. This will be considered in another chapter.

<sup>1</sup> York Plays, p. 15.

<sup>2</sup> See the Coventry Mysteries, p. 220.

Whether a cycle would close with the Descent of the Holy Spirit is to my mind somewhat doubtful. The Italian short cycle already cited<sup>1</sup> exhibits a play of this character, with the plays of Burial and Resurrection as introductory. It is possible that it was considered on theological grounds a fitting close, though most cycles passed on to the Judgment Day. On the other hand, it would be nothing surprising, if the Mercers had discarded their old play for a play of the later fashion. The York play, 'The Judgment Day,' is a late play, and will be examined in another chapter.

These sixteen plays, then, can be segregated as an ancient cycle, which stood as prototype for the craft cycles of Woodkirk and Coventry, and, probably, of Beverly. There are reasons, however, for believing that the demand for expansion came soon, and that certain additions had already been made when the Woodkirk compiler looked to York for a part of his material.

We will next consider the status of the plays of the parent cycle in the other cycles, and then examine into the evidences for the expansion of this cycle prior to the establishment of the Woodkirk plays.

XXII.

THE PARENT CYCLE IN THE WOODKIRK PLAYS.

The following plays of the parent cycle are found, in whole or in part, in the Woodkirk plays. Y XI = W 'Pharao;' Y XVII = W 'Oblacio Magorum,' one stanza only; Y XX = W 'Pagina Doctorum;' Y XXXVII = W 'Extractio Animarum.'

The relation of W 'Pharao' to Y XI can be best shown by contrasting corresponding verses that shall be as nearly consecutive as possible. I have chosen the first twenty-three lines of the York play; the verse that seems to me the nearest to the original is given as the second in each case, and the reason for my decision is suggested by the word following. These comparisons can hardly be classed as text emendations—any authoritative settlement of the questions arising would lead me too far afield—but they will serve to illustrate the relative purity of the texts.

O pees, I bidde þat noman passe, Y, 1.

Peas, of payn that no man pas, W. Alliteration.

And take good hede of hym that has, W.

And takes gud heede to hym þat hasse, Y, 3. Cp. XXXVII. l. 37.

<sup>1</sup> See p. 77.

Your liff all haly in his hande, Y, 4.
 Your helthe alle holy in hys hande,<sup>1</sup> W. Alliteration.
 I am hys hayre as age wylle has, W.
 I am hys hayre as elde will asse, Y, 7. Elde, asse.
 I wold my myghte were knowne, W.
 I will my myght be knawen, Y, 11. Tense.
 And of youre wordes looke that ye seasse, W.
 And of youre sawes I rede you sees, Y, 17. Alliteration.
 And at my liste lose liff and lyre, Y, 20.
 And to my list bowe lyfe and lyre, W. Unstressed alliteration.
 My Lord, if any here were, W.
 My lorde, yf any were, Y, 21. Verse movement.
 If we myghte com thaym nere, W.
 And we wist whilke thay were, Y, 23. Alliteration.

With these comparisons we place the following additions and omissions. W adds—

After stanza 1. Full low he shalle be thrawne
 That harkyns not my sawe,
 Hanged by and drawne,
 Therfor no boste ye blawe.
 After stanza 9. Do of thy shoyes in fere,
 Wyth mowth as I the melle,
 The place thou standes in there
 Forsoth, is halowd welle.
 After stanza 10. Bot I wylle not so do,
 In me if thay wylle trast
 Bondage to brynge thaym fro.
 Therfor thou go in hast.
 In stanza 22. In no mans time that ever was borne.
 Pharao. Telle on, belyfe, and make an end.
 In stanza 28. Yit were it better that thai yede.
 W omits—
 In stanza 22. Sir kyng, we banne þat we wer borne,
 Oure blisse is all with bales blende.
 In stanza 25. Als wele on myddyng als on more.
 In stanza 28. Lorde, war they wente þan walde it sese,
 So shuld we save vs and our seede.
 also, Late hym do fourth! þe devill hym spedē!

Y stanza 31 is paralleled by W. The stanza illustrates the methods by which W often reduces a 4-stress verse to a 3-stress line. The rime series, 'pay,' 'betray,' 'garray,' 'slay,' makes it probable that this stanza is an excerpt from some other play.<sup>2</sup>

Y, stanza 31. For at oure will now sadl we wende,
 In hande of lykyng for to lende.
 i. puer.—Kyng Pharo, that felowns fende,
 Will haue grete care fro this be kende,
 Than will he schappe hym vs to shende,
 And sone his Ooste afir vs sende.

<sup>1</sup> But 'helthe' is a favorite word, cp. Y XXXVII. W uses 'helth' for 'heelee,' lines 38, 106.

<sup>2</sup> See p. 143.

Moyse.—Beis nocht aferde, god is youre frende,
 Fro alle oure foees he will vs fende.
 þarfore comes furthe with me,
 Haves done, and drede you nocht.

ii. puer.—My lorde, loved mott þou bee,
 þat þus fro bale has brought.

W.—Com furthe, now salle ye weynd
 To land of lykyng you to pay.

Primus Puer.—Bot kyng Pharao, that fals feynd,
 He will us eff betray;
 Fulle soyn he wille shape us to sheynd,
 And after us send his garray.

Moyse.—Be not abast, God is our freynd,
 And alle oure foes wille slay;
 Therfor com on with me,
 Have done and drede you nocht.

Secundus Puer.—That Lord blyst might he be,
 That us from baylie has brought.

Certain expressions and substitutions of words for differences in dialects are worthy a passing notice. A favorite oath in W—‘the ragyd dwylle,’ l. 251, 325, 403.

‘in mynde’ for ‘haue I mende,’ W, 121. Misunderstood.

‘way’ for ‘wothis,’ W, 138. wothis = harm. Misunderstood.

‘lepre’ for ‘serpent,’ W, 154. Criticism of his text.

‘socoure’ for ‘belde,’ W, 180. Dialectal change.

‘Brethere’ for ‘Beeths’ (?), W, 197.

‘wyle’ for ‘wynne,’ W, 220.

‘loselle’ for ‘lurdayne,’ W, 229.

‘wyth’ for ‘Hopp,’ W, 245. Dialectal change.

‘trow’ for ‘hopp,’ W, 275 (?).

‘lang’ for ‘lande,’ W, 282.

‘bond’ for ‘garre feste,’ W, 308. Dialectal change.

‘myst’ for ‘myrke,’ W, 344. Dialectal change.

‘fals’ for ‘felowns,’ W, 363 (?).

These changes for dialectal reasons probably mark not alone a difference of vocabulary in the two districts, but also a change of obsolescent words for those of accepted currency. This is another proof that the compilation of the Woodkirk cycle is considerably later than the date of the parent cycle of York.

W ‘Oblacio Magorum,’ to which Y XVII corresponds, shows but slight indebtedness to the York play. The greater portion of the play is in the stanza a a a b a b. This was a favorite stanza for church poetry. The play was universally given in connection with the Christmas service. It is probable that the compiler incorporated a church play into his cycle. One of two alternatives is certain, either he had the York play before him, or at a later date the York introduction of the angel displaced the original message.

From the compiler’s known method of work, I judge that he compared the church play with the York.

The 'Nuncius' enters with the York introduction, "Mi lorde ser Herode." Mary salutes the Magi with the same words as in York, "Sir kynges." These agreements, however, do not necessarily argue a borrowing from York. They may be conventional entrances widely adopted in church plays.<sup>1</sup> Many other characteristics agree in general treatment, as might be expected with common clerical traditions of more than a century's acceptance.

In some points, however, these plays follow different traditions. We know, for example, from the Latin plays extant, that the introduction of the Doctors with their books<sup>2</sup> was common,<sup>3</sup> and that sometimes the kings were summoned<sup>2</sup> by a messenger, sometimes appeared unannounced. In these particulars W and Y follow different models. This would seem to argue that the play in question was used in some church not in close affiliation with York, possibly in the Midland district.

The direct appropriation of material from the York play is confined to one stanza, stanza 27 of the York play.<sup>4</sup> This is taken without change other than a re-arrangement of the cauda by the transposition of a verse. The original rime a b a b becomes a b b a in the Woodkirk play.

Y XX=W 'Pagina Doctorum,' true Co 'The Weavers' Pageant, Ch 'The Purification,' so-called Co 'Christ Disputing in the Temple.' The relationships here are so significant, and the results flowing from them so important, that a separate chapter will be given to this play.

Y XXXVII was made the basis for W 'Extractio Animarum,' and some unknown play was used to supplement it. This play, therefore, illustrates the reverse of the method pursued in 'Oblacio Magorum,' but agrees with 'Pharao.'

The first eight verses of Y, twelve of W, are different. In the W verses I seem to detect a lyric, carol-like quality, such as seems present in portions of W 'Conspiracio et Captio.'

W adds the following passages. Before stanza 5 Isaias speaks eight verses—

Isaias. Adam, through thy syn
Here were we put to dwelle
This wykyd place within,
The name of it is helle;
Here paynes shalle never blyn
That wykyd ar and felle,
Loue that lord withe wyn
His lyfe for vs wold selle.

<sup>1</sup> See p. 134.

<sup>2</sup> So in the play of the twelfth century at Nevers, Romania, vol. 4, p. 4. Also cp. Freising and Orleans plays, p. 83.      <sup>3</sup> Not so in Jubinal, Mystères inédits, vol. 2, p. 95.

<sup>4</sup> This was discovered by Hertrich, p. 4.

Before stanza 9. Rybald. Sen fyrst that helle was mayde,
And I was put therein
Siche sorow never ere I had,
Nor hard I siche a dyn;
My hart begynnys to brade,
My wytt waxys thyn,
I drede we can not be glad,
Thise saules mon fro us twyn.

With considerable re-arrangement of parts, after the words, "Atolite," etc., the line, "Out, harro, out! what deville is he." This confusion arises from the rejection of the translation accompanying the Latin lines.

After line 140. If that brodelle com ne
With vu ay won he shalle.

After line 126. David says—Nay, withe hym may ye not fyght,
For he is kyng and conqueroure.
in the place of— I lered leuand with-uten lees,
He is a kyng of vertues clere.

After line 130. Of hym commys alle this light
That shynys in this bowre.

After line 136, eight lines are inserted, the last eight of stanza 12 having been used earlier.

How sir Sathanas, com nar
And hark this eursid rowte!
Sathanas. The deville you all to-har!
What ales the so to showte?
And me, if I com nar
Thy brayn bot I bryst owte.
Belzabub. Thou must com help to spar,
We are beseged abowte.

A transposition of Jesus's speech takes place, and the discarding of the Latin, while the translation is retained—Y gives both—is made the excuse for the introduction of two additional lines.

And let my folk furthe gone
. . . . .
Wheder ye wille or none.

Before stanza 17. Rybald. What art thou that spekys so?
Jesus. A king of blys that hight Jesus.
Rybald. Yee, hens fast I red thou go,
And melle the not with vs.
Belzabub. Oure yates I trow wille last,
Thay ar so strong I weyn,
Bot if oure barres brast
For the thay shalle not twyn.

Before line 198, in place of—Telle lucifer alle is unlokynne,
Belsabub exclaims—Harro! oure yates begyn to crak,
In sonder, I trow, they go,
And helle, I trow will alle-to-shak:
Alas, what I am wo!

The last two additions improve the dramatic quality of the action.

Before line 201, Satan exclaims,

Yee, hangyd he thou on a cruke.

Before stanza 26, Sathanas. Whi, and wille thou take theym alle me fro?

Then thynk me thou art vnkynde;

Nay I pray the do not so,

Vmthynke the better in thy mynde.

Or els let me with the go,

I pray the leyfe me not behynde.

Jesus. Nay triatur, thou shalle won in wo,

And tille a stake I shalle the bynde.

This serves for the expansion of a favorite motive. Before line 349, a substitution of four verses by Jesus for two by Satan.

Satan. Allas! for dole, and care,

I synke in to helle pitte.

Jesus. Com now furthe my childer alle,

I forgyf you youre mys;

Withe me now go ye shalle

To joy and endles blys.

These excerpts are evidently full double quatrain stanzas in four cases, viz: before stanzas 5, 9, and 26, and in stanza 12. Before stanza 17 are two half stanzas, and single half-stanzas occur before lines 198 and 349. I think it safe to conclude that the play was written in double quatrain stanzas.

Whether these stanzas were composed of 4-stress verses is a more difficult question. These excerpts are prevailingly 3-stressed, but our redactor often reduces 4-stress lines to 3-stress by dropping adverbs, connectives, and unimportant words; thus in stanza 25, lines 2, 7, and 8, and in a notable way lines 198–200.

I do not think that structural alliteration was present, though this author sometimes effaced it beyond recognition. I conclude from the above considerations that the play was not a Northern play.

The redactor followed his own judgment also in the matter of omission. It is not necessary to quote the lines of the York play that he dropped. They are, inclusive, lines 15–18, stanza 3 entire, lines 51–2, 55, 58, 60, 122, 124, 127–8, 181, 183, 339–40, 343–4, 347–8.

In some few particulars the W text is more accurate than the Y; Y, line 370—

Ofte tymes tolde vntill vs, is assigned with the remainder of stanza 31 to 'John Baptista.' In his mouth it lacks point, as he is a new-comer to hell. W gives the last four lines of the stanza, including this line, to Moses, which makes the line in character. Y, line 113, gives A for the proper name which W gives as Anaballe. Y, line 135, reads by blunder of the scribe 'lady' where W writes correctly 'lad.' The aid that W can afford toward a restoration of the text is, however, much less in this play than in Y XI.

There are evidences that the author of W had a slightly illegible copy of Y. Such mistakes as 'frande' for 'frewte,' line 10; 'night' for 'light,' line 85; 'bright' for 'sight,' line 90; 'shalle the sow' for 'telle the nowe,' line 218, point to a difficulty of decipherment.

Dialectal changes similar to those made in Y XI<sup>1</sup> occur.

|  |                                 |
|--|---------------------------------|
| 'boght' for 'getyn,' l. 11.                          | 'tokyn' for 'signe,' l. 19, 41. |
| 'shedyng' for 'bying,' l. 12.                        | 'myrth' for 'grace,' l. 20.     |
| 'wille' for 'schall,' l. 13, 22.                     | 'know' for 'schewe,' l. 22.     |
| 'helth' for 'heelee,' l. 38, 106.                    | 'can' for 'gune,' l. 47, 286.   |
| 'darknes' for 'mirke,' l. 53.                        | 'water' for 'floode,' l. 76.    |
| 'shewid' for 'mustered,' l. 86.                      | 'thurt' for 'neyd,' l. 242.     |
| 'ment' for 'preched,' l. 291.                        | 'wille' for 'liste,' l. 313.    |
| 'trew' for 'soth,' l. 327.                           | 'sete' for 'selle,' l. 342.     |
| 'In blys to dwelle' for 'wonne in mirthe,' l. 228.   |                                 |
| 'It shalbe lang' for 'all schall nogt gang,' l. 303. |                                 |

'Rebald,' l. 99, is understood as a proper name, and, as 'Rybold,' is assigned to one of the devils. 'Glory' for 'gilery,' l. 160. Now 'gilery' means 'deceit'; consequently, this guess was rather wild. 'Ilke' for 'obitte,' l. 269. This attempt to Anglicize the Latin 'obit' was not appreciated. The indebtedness of W to the York cycle is not confined to these plays of the parent cycle. We shall return again to the discussion in a later chapter.

XXIII.

THE WOODKIRK PLAY, 'CONSPIRACIO ET CAPTIO.'

This play, which has preserved a fragment of the parent cycle, lost to the York cycle, is a pieced play, containing, within the compass of a single play, work of the earliest and of the latest period, as well as something by that author whose plays mark the beginnings of English comedy. It is a canto, containing in its eight hundred and eighty-five verses specimens of almost every age and style of mystery play from the date of separation from the church service until the spirit of the Reformation transformed the mystery into the morality, the chronicle history, and the comedy.

<sup>1</sup> See p. 149.

A. The introduction consists of six stanzas by 'Pilatus' in the late style.<sup>1</sup> The verses of the first stanzaic section might easily be read with five or six stresses.<sup>2</sup> The rime is very striking, a a a a b c c c b.

This same stanza, with more or less irregularity of structure, is found in nine plays: 'Processus Noe;' 'Prima Pastorum;' 'Secunda Pastorum;' 'Magnus Herodes;' 'Conspiracio et Captio,' first six stanzas; 'Colaphizacio;' 'Flagellacio,' from 'Primus Tortor' to 'Johannes Apostolus;' 'Processus Talentorum,' perhaps, though the confusion is extreme; the devil play in 'Juditium,' which is the development of a minor motive in the York 'The Judgment Day.'

These plays are notable in that they contain the first attempts in English literature at the construction of a comedy of manners. In other mystery plays we find shrewd references to existing customs, comic episodes for the diversion of the audience; thus in Ch, 'Mulier' in 'The Harrowing of Hell,' Joseph's part in 'The Weavers' Pageant,' and elsewhere, but here only does the comedy seek its own ends with dramatic movement.

There is an evident attempt at faithful presentation of the life of the day. The detail of the meal in 'Prima Pastorum;' the farce, the complaints about landlords and taxation, against the weather, the remarks about the burden of many children in poor families, the fondness for proverbs, and the comments upon wedlock—all of which occur in 'Secunda Pastorum'—mark this writer as the herald of a new era, the pioneer of an advance in English literature.

The later satire of manners is fitly introduced by him. Tutivillus in 'Juditium' is a precursor of the Vice, far more trenchant and dramatic than many a later Vice, whose remarks lay bare the follies, extortion, and oppression of the day. How far this writer had advanced beyond his fellows in dramatic power is revealed by a comparison of Joseph's attempts at home thrusts in 'The Weavers' Pageant'<sup>3</sup> with the action in 'Processus Noe' and the 'Secunda Pastorum.' In the first the phrasing is awkward, retards the action in many cases; in the second the thought comes sharp, quick, and the action knows no halt.

This author neglects no opportunity of exposing the iniquities of his day; even in the six introductory stanzas of the 'Conspiracio et Captio,' Pilate represents a later generation of politician:

<sup>1</sup> See p. 123.

<sup>2</sup> Schipper, vol. 1, p. 391.

<sup>3</sup> The Presentation in the Temple: A Pageant as originally represented by the Corporation of the Weavers of Coventry: Edinburgh, Printed by the Abbotsford Club.

For I am he that may make or mar a man,
 My self if I it say as men of cowrte now say;
 Supporte a man to-day, to-morne agans him than,
 On both parties thus I play and fenys me to ordan

The right;

Bot alle fals indytars,
 Quest mangers and jurers,
 And alle thise fals out ryders,
 Ar welcom to my sigigt.

The coarseness of the early English comedy, of Gammar Gurton's Needle, is here, but it is probably no coarser than the life it depicts. The shepherd folk, the Mak of the hovel, the peasant and his wife, were prone to call a spade a spade. The fun is old English fun, rude, coarse, outspoken, and fond of hard knocks, but not lascivious.

But where in the history of these cycles does this author stand? The stanza is late. In 'Conspiracio et Captio' his work is an introduction; in 'Flagellacio' it is the play to which a foreign introduction has been prefixed. I judge him a late contributor to a cycle already long established. His plays seem to me a direct contribution to the cycle, rather than plays elsewhere popular which finally gained a position in the cycle, because his work in 'Conspiracio et Captio' is of the nature of a new introduction to a play with which he was conversant. His other plays, especially those of the shepherds, superseded the plays of the original compilation.

Possibly one significant agreement may point to his church affiliations, since it seems to prove an acquaintance with one set of church plays rather than another:—<sup>1</sup>

Noah's answer to Deus, "What art thou," W.

Noah's answer to Angel, "What art thou," Newcastle.

Noah's answer to Deus, "A! Lorde, I lowe þe lowde and stille," Y.

Noah's answer to God, "O, Lorde, I thanke thee lowde and stille," Ch.

It is not impossible that light might be shed upon the literary interdependence of the churches by an exhaustive study of such passages.

B. The passage from "Cayphas" to "Tunc dicet Sanctus Johannes" is the fragment of the parent cycle whose characteristics we have already discussed.<sup>2</sup>

C. This passage extends from "Tunc dicet Sanctus Johannes" to the words—"Now wote ye what I have done," in Jesus' speech. This is introductory to the final instructions of Jesus to his disciples. It is written in couplets, which, towards the last, approach the succeeding extract in the literalness of its rendering of the Biblical narration. Such passages, as we have already shown,<sup>1</sup> are to be attributed to the hand of the compiler himself.

<sup>1</sup> See p. 132.

<sup>2</sup> See p. 143.

D. The passage, beginning—"Now wote ye what I have done," and closing with the introduction of Pilate, is of a different character. With the exception of the part assigned to 'Trinitas,' it is almost an exact translation of the Biblical narrative, though usually taken in sequence. If we begin for example, at the words—

In my fader house, for sothe,
Is many a wonnyng stede,

the author paraphrases very literally the following passages,—John XIV, 2, 3, 6, 18, 19, 20, 28, 29, 30, 31, Mark XIV, 33, 38, 34, Luke XXII, 42, Mark XIV, 37, etc. The selection seems to be made with reference to dramatic quality, when possible; thus, he chooses from Mark, "Simon, dormis?" in preference to Luke's, "Et ait illis: Quid dormitis?"

The stanza is the quatrain. One may venture to say that the verses were originally alternate 4's and 3's, i. e. septenar couplets with riming cæsuras, but the alterations have been such that we cannot pronounce upon the verse with certainty.

E. The passage, beginning with 'Pilatus' and closing with the introduction of 'Malcus Miles,' shows signs of connection with the York plays upon the same subject, or was modeled upon work of that school.

W begins—Peas I comaunde you, carles unkynde,
To stand as styll as any stone,
In donyon depe he shalbe pynde,
That will not sesse his tong anone.

In Y XIX Herod exclaims—

Stente of youre steuenes stoute,
And stille as stone ge stande.

In Y XXXII Pilatus commands—

And loke þat ye stirre with no striffe but stand stone still.

These may be stock expressions, but the use of them would argue some community of interest between the authors.

F. Beginning with 'Malcus Miles,' four stanzas are inserted into the play, whose structure we recognize as that of the so-called Coventry plays: a b a b a b c d d d e. It would seem that this passage and that marked E must be late interpolations, for the words of Jesus—

"Ryse up, Peter, and go with me," should follow the last speech of Jesus, i. e. the close of passage D, without break.

<sup>1</sup> See p. 129.

There are, then, in this cento seven distinct passages, the work of six different authors. Indeed, I suspect that single sentences, which were favorite expressions of the day, are imbedded in O, but am not sufficiently conversant with the literature of the day to locate them.

We will now consider another play which exhibits marked correspondences in all the cycles.

---

XXIV.

THE PLAY OF THE ANNUNCIATION.

- Y. The Annunciation, and Visit of Elizabeth to Mary.
 W. Annunciacio.
 W. Salutacio Elizabeth.
 Ch. The Salutation and Nativity.
 Co. The Salutation and Conception.
 Co. The Visit to Elizabeth.
 S & T. The Pageant of the Shearmen and Taylors of Coventry.

The Prologue of Y is in the stanza of the parent cycle. We will make that the basis of the comparison of Prologue :

- Y, 2. Howe man was made with-uten mysse.
 W, 2. And Adam with my handes bath wrought.
 Y, 3. And sette whare he sulde euer haue bene.
 W, 5. To won ther in, as that I weynd.
 Y, 6. And was putte oute fro paradys.
 W, 7. Then I hyme put out of that place,
 Y, 7. And sithen what sorouse sor warre sene
 Sente vn-to hym and to al his.
 W, 11. For he has bought his syn fulle sore.
 Y, 9. And howe they lay lunge space
 In helle lokyn fro lyght.
 W, 12. Thise v thousand yeris and more,
 Fyrst in erth, and sythen in helle.
 Y, 11. Tille god graunted þam grace
 Of helpe, als he hadde hyght.
 W, 14. Bot long therin shalle he not dwelle,
 Outt of payn he shalle be boght,
 I wyll not tynce that I have wrought.
 W, 15-42. Will send his Son.
 Y, 17-132. The statements of the prophets, in Latin with English exposition.
 W, 43-50. As his prophets have said.
 Y, 134-144. Luke says that God sent Gabriel.
 W, 51-74. Deus commands Gabriel to go.

-
- Co. Prologue by Contemplacio. Parallel passages are—To Y, 9. Ffowre thousand six undryd four yere I telle Man ffor his offens and fflowle foly,
 Hath loyn zeres in the peynes of helle,

- To Y, II. Good Lord, have on man pyté,
 Have mende of the prayour said by Ysaie.
 The Virtues plead and the Son resolves to go.
 Deus commands Gabriel to go.
 S & T. Prologue by Isaye.—A general prologue.
 Ch. Has no prologue.

The sequence of thought between W and Y is too marked for accident. The passage in W is in couplets. I think that we must conclude that the compiler of W was dissatisfied with the long non-dramatic prologue of Y, re-wrote the first stanza, following closely the sequence of thought, and added what he considered more appropriate matter. The use made by Y of Latin passages with English exposition, as in his 'Harrowing of Hell,' was in accordance with the traditions of church plays.

No sign of any knowledge of the York Prologue is shown by the writers of the other plays.

We proceed to examine the play itself, and here we add the correspondent passages from the Bible.

- Y, 145, Ang. Hayle! Marie! full of grace and blysse,
 Oure lord god is with þe,
 And has chosen þe for his,
 Of all women blist mot þou be.
- S T. Gaberell. Hayle maré full of grace owre lord god ys with thé Aboue all wemen þat eður wasse Ladé blesside mote thou be.
- Ch. Gabriell. Heale be thou, Marye, mother ffree,
 Full of grace, God is with thee,
 Amonge all wemen blessed thou be,
 And the frute of thy bodye.
- W. Gabrielle. Haylle Mary, gracyouse, Haylle madyn and Godes spouse.
 . . . . .
 Of alle vyrgyns thou art qwene.
 3 lines.
 My lord of heven is wyth the.
- Co. Gabriel. Heyl, fful of grace, God is with the.
 Amonge alle wemen blyssyd art thou.
- Luke 1, 28. Ave, gratia plena: Dominus tecum: Benedicte tu in mulieribus, et 42. benedictus fructus ventris tui.
- Y 149-52. Mary expresses surprise.
 S & T. Mary expresses amazement and trouble.
 Ch. Mary expresses amazement and trouble.
- W. Marie. What is thi name?
 Co. Mary marvels at the greeting.
- Luke 1, 29. Quæ cum audisset, turbata est in sermone ejus, et cogitabat qualis esset ista salutatio.
- Y 153. Ne drede þe nought, þou mylde marie.
 S & T. Dred thé nothyng meydin of this.
 Co. Mary, in this take ye no drede.
 W. Goodly lady, have thou no drede.
 Ch. Marye, ney dreded thee naughte this casse.
- Luke 1, 30. Ne timeas, Maria.

- Y 155-6. For þou has fun souerany
At god a grace ouer othir all.
3 lines.
- S & T. Salutyng thé here asse most exselent Whose virtue aboue all othir dothe abownde.
- Co. Ffor at God grace fflownde haue ye.
- W. For thou has fouden alle thyn oone,
The grace of God.
- Ch. With greate God founde thou haste Amonge all wemen especiall grace.
- Luke 1, 30. Inuenisti enim gratiam apud Deum.
- Y 158-9. In chastite of thy bodye
Consayue and bere a childe þou sall.
- S & T. For thou shalt conseyye apon þis grownd.
- Ch. Therefore, marye, thou mone Conseave and beare, I tell thee,
A child.
- W. Thou shalle conceyye within thy sydys
A chyld of myght.
- Co. Ye xall conceyye in your wombe indede
A child.
- Luke 1, 31. Ecce concipies in utero, et paries filium.
- Y, 160. His name Jesu sall þou calle.
- S & T. . . . .
- Ch. His name Jesus shalbe.
- W. Calle hym Jesum.
- Co. His name of you Jhesu clepyd xall be,
- Luke 1, 31. Et vocabis nomen ejus Jesum.
- Y, 161. Mekill of myght þan sall he bee.
- S & T. . . . .
- Ch. So greate shalbe never non as he.
- W. Myghtfulle man shalle he be that.
- Co. He xall be grett.
- Luke 1, 32. Hic crit magnus.
- Y, 162. He sall be God and called God sonne.
- S & T. . . . .
- Ch. And called Godes sonne.
- W. And Godes son shalle he hat.
- Co. The son of the hyst clepyd of kende.
- Luke 1, 32. Et Filius Altissimi vocabitur.
- Y, 163-4. David sege, his fadir free,
Sall God hym giffe to sytte vppon.
- S & T. . . . .
- Ch. Shall geve hym David his fathers see.
- W. My Lord, also shalle gyf hym tytle, Hys fader sete David, at wylle,
Therein to sytte.
- Co. And of his fladyr, Davyd, the Lord xall geve hym the se.
- Luke 1, 32. Et dabit illi Dominus Deus sedem David patris ejus.
- Y, 165-6. Als kyng for euer regne sall hee,
In Jacob house ay for to wounne.
- S & T. . . . .
- Ch. In Jacobes house raigne shall he,
With full mighte ever more.
- W. He shalle be kyng in Jacob kyn,
His kyngdom shalle never blyn.
- Co. Reynyng in the hous of Jacob, of whiche regne xal be non ende.
- Luke 1, 32. Et regnabit in domo Jacob in aeternum.

- Y, 167-8. Of his kyngdome and dignite
Shall noo man erthly knaw ne con.
- S & T. . . . .
- Ch. That suche renowne and royalltye Hade never non before.
- W & Co. . . . .
- Luke 1, 33. Et regni ejus non erit finis.
- Y, 170, 173. How sulde it be . . . . .
I knawe no man . . . . .
- S & T. I marvell soore how thatt mabé.
Mans cumpany knev I nevur yett.
- Ch. How maye this be? . . . . .
In synne knewe I no worldlye wighte.
- W. How shuld it be?
I cam never by man's syde,
- Co. In what manere of wyse xal this be?
Ffor knowyng of man I have non now.
- Luke 1, 34. Quomodo fiet istud quoniam virum non cognosco?
- Y, 175-8. Ang. The Halygast in þe sall lighte, Hegh vertue sall to þe holde,
- S & T. The whollé gost in thé schall lyght
And schado thy soll soo with vertuo,
- Ch. The Holye Ghoste shall in thee lighte
From God in magistie,
And shadowe thee seemlye in sight;
The Holy Gost shalle light in the,
And his vertue,
He shall umshade, and fulfyllé.
- Co. The Holy Gost xal come fro above to the,
And the vertu of hym hyest xal schadn the so.
- Luke 1, 35. Spiritus sanctus superveniet in te, et virtus altissimi obumbrabit tibi.
- Y, 175-80. The holy birthe of the so bright,
God sonne he sall be calde.
- S & T. This chylde that of thé schalbe borne Ys the second persone in treneté.
- Ch. Theirfore that holye, as I have teighte,
That thou shalte beare, through Godes mighte,
His sonne shall called be.
- W. The child that thou shalle bere, madame,
Shalle Godes son be callid by name.
- Co. Therefore that Holy Gost of the xal be bore,
He xal be clepyd the son of God says.
- Luke 1, 35. Ideoque et quod nascetur ex te Sanctum, vocabitur Filius Dei.
- Y, 181-2. Loo Elyzabeth. þi cosyne, ne myght
In elde consayne a childe for alde.
- S & T. Be holde Eylesabeth thy cosyn elene
The wych wasse barren & past all age.
- Ch. Elizabeth, that barren was,
As thou maie se, conseaveid has
In age a sonne through Godes grace.
- W. Elisabeth, thi cosyn, that is cald geld,
She has conceyffed a son in elde.
- Co. And so Elyzabeth your cosyn thore,
She hath consevyid a son in hyre age.
- Luke 1, 36. Et ecce Elizabeth cognata tua et ipsa concepit filium in senectute sua.
- Y, 183-4. This is the sexte moneth full ryght,
To hir that baran has ben talde.

S & T. And now with chyld sehe hath bene
Syx monethis and more asse schalbe sene.

Ch. The seixte month is gone nowe againe
Scith men called her barene.

W. And this is, who wyffe late,
The sext monthe of her conceytate,
That geld is cadd.

Co. This is the sexte monyth of here passage,
Of here that clepyd was bareyn.

Luke I, 36. Et nunc mensis sextus est illi, quæ vocatur sterilis.

Y. . . . .

S & T. For to god onpossibull nothyng mabé.

Ch. But nothinge to Godes mighte and mayne Impossible ys.

W. No word, lady, that I the bryng,
Is unmyghtfulle to heven hyng,
But alle shalle hald.

Co. Nothyng is impossyble to Goddys usage.

Luke I, 37. Quia non erit impossibile apud Deum omne verbum.

Y, 189-92. Goddis handmayden, lo! me here,
To his will all redy grayd,
Be done to me of all manere.

S & T. Hys hy pleysuris forto full fyll
Asse his one hand mayde I submyt me.

Ch. Loe! Godes cossen meklye here, . . . . .
Leve that yt falle in such manere.

W. I am his madyn at his hand, . . . . .
Be done to me in alle thyng.

Co. Se here the hand-mayden of our Lorde,
Aftyr thi worde be it don to me.

Luke I, 38. Ecce ancilla Domini, fiat mihi secundum verbum tuum.

Y. Scene II. Mary visits Elizabeth and salutes her. Luke I, 40.

S & T. Joseph's trouble about Mary: then the coming of the shepherds.
The visit is omitted.

Ch. Mary visits Elizabeth. — Elizabeth, nice God thee see!

W. Joseph's trouble about Mary. Next play 'Salutacio Elizabeth.'

Co. Play xii. 'Joseph's Return:' then, play xiii, 'Visit to Elizabeth.'

Y, 205-208. Blissid beþou anely
Of all women in feere,
And þe frute of thy body
Be blissid feere and nere.

Ch. Marye, blessed moste thou be,
And the frute that comes of thee
Amonge women alle.

W. Introductory conversation of thirty lines; then—
Blyssed be thou of alle women.
And the fraye that I welle ken,
Within the wombe of the.

Co. A long introduction; then—
Blyssd be thou amonge alle women.
And blyssed be the frute of thi womb also.

Luke I, 42. Benedicta tu inter mulieres, et benedictus fructus ventris tui.

Y, 209-212. þis is ioyfull tydyng þat I may nowe here see,
þe modyr of my lord kyng,
þus-gate come to me.

- Ch. Wonderlye nowe marvailles me,
That Marye, Godes mother freye,
Greetes me this of symple degreecy.
- W. And this tyme may I blys,
That my lordes moder is Comon thus unto me.
- Co. How is it that the modyr of God me xulde come to?
- Luke 1, 43. Et unde hoc mihi ut veniat mater Domini mei ad me?
- Y, 213-16. Sone als þe voyce of þine haylſing Moght myn neres entre and be,
þe childe in my wombe so yenge,
Makes grete myrthe vnto þe.
- Ch. When thou me greeteste, sweete Marye,
The childe stored in my bodye,
For greate joye of thy companye.
- W. For syn that tyme fulle welle I wote,
The stevyn of angelle voce it smote,
And rang now in myne ere;
A selecouthe thyng is me betyde,
The chyld makys joy, as any byrd,
That I in body bere.
- Co. . . . .
- Luke 1, 44. Ecce enim ut facta est vox salutationis tue in auribus meis, exultavit in gaudio infans in utero meo.
- Y, 217-240. A free rendering of the 'Magnificat,' broken by a stanza by Elizabeth.
- Ch. Luke 1, 46 and 47 quoted with slight changes, amplified in English, and followed by a paraphrase of the remainder of the 'Magnificat.'
- Co. Mary gives the Magnificat, sentence by sentence, and Elizabeth translates each sentence.

The above comparisons lead naturally to four conclusions:—

First. All lists of agreeing passages, where the agreement arises from the literal translation of dramatic passages of the Biblical narrative, are misleading when used to support a theory of direct interdependence among the extant plays.

Secondly. The earliest church plays gave with literal fidelity the Biblical narrative when it was phrased in conversation, i. e. was adapted to dramatic presentation. Later redactors were reluctant to change passages that were already dramatic, and yet adhered closely to the sacred story; hence the unchanged play spread through the churches. The writers of cycles were conversant with the plays, each with those of his church, and adopted such passages with but few changes, since the movement was dramatic, and the language faithful to the sacred text; hence a striking similarity arose where sometimes no connection existed.

Thirdly. Until as thorough-going an agreement is shown between the church plays of France and those of England as is here shown among the plays of different cycles, we must claim the Chester play as a product of England. Here lies another strong proof that the Chester plays were written on English soil.

Fourthly. It would seem that the play in question must have been originally the work of one author, that this author wrote it in Latin for a church play, and that this play was adopted for some reason in many churches. I should place its composition at an earlier date than that of the cyclic plays, for the writer of the York parent cycle incorporated it in his cycle, writing for it a prologue of his own.

I believe that the writer of the W play, not the compiler of the W cycle, had this York play before him, since he recast a part of the prologue; but he departed further from the Biblical text than any other writer, exhibiting such independence as the compiler of W nowhere shows. The Ch and Co plays were probably taken directly from the play in the church best known to the author. The stanzaic structure agrees sufficiently well in each cycle with the author's known style to render it probable that the play was translated independently in each case. The Shearmen and Taylors' play may be a church play, or may be in part the York play, as is certainly the other extant Coventry play.

Finally. A word here about the redactor of the true Coventry plays may be in place. Robert Croo considered that he had accomplished a laudable undertaking when he had modernized the Coventry plays. His execrable spelling, pointless interpolations, and attempts at comic writing, especially in the part of Joseph in the Weavers' play, mark him as a man of little education and less taste. He, or his son, appears to have been a necessary factotum of the mystery play business in Coventry. One sometimes wonders if he were not a manager who, for a consideration, presented the plays for one or more gilds. I do not know that any one has directed attention to his name in the gild accounts as given by Sharp. The items are as follows—

Smiths' Pageant.

1563—It' to Robert Croo for ij leves of ore play boke viij d.

Drapers' Pageant.

1557—paid to Robert Crowe for makynge of the boke for the paggen xx s.

1560—It' payd to Robert Croo for playynge God iijs. iiij d.

1560—payd to Cro for mendynge the devells cottis xx d.

1562—Itm payde Robert Croo for a hat for the pharysye xij d.

1556—payd to Crowe for makynge of iij worldys ij s.

[In 1560 the sum paid him was 3 s. 8 d.]

—payd him more for same iijs. viij d.

Sharp states that Croo was employed also by the Cappers and Shearmen's Companies in a similar manner.

XXV.

CHRIST WITH THE DOCTORS IN THE TEMPLE.

This play, Y XX, is a play of the parent cycle. It is also, with variations, the 'Pagina Doctorum' of the Woodkirk cycle, the 'Weavers' Pageant' of Coventry, and 'The Purification' of the Chester cycle. Certain relations exist also between it and the Coventry play, 'Christ Disputing in the Temple.' As this is the only play of the parent cycle that has found its way into four gild cycles, it is worthy of a somewhat minute analysis.

The introduction.—In W of Co a play of the prophets comes first. It is unlike the play of any other cycle. How this play could find place as an introduction to 'Christ in the Temple' in a cycle which contained the Salutation, is difficult of explanation. There is every reason for believing that these cycles at first followed strictly the sequence of the Biblical narrative. This transference of the play of the prophets to a position subsequent to that of the Salutation must be a late innovation, though I see no reason for attributing it to Robert Croo, who has enough to answer for without it.

The episode of Simeon, Anna, and the Angels.—The agreement among the plays is that of a common church tradition reinforced by literary convention. This episode, together with that of Joseph and Mary's journey to the temple, bears the marks of the later literary fashion in most of the plays. I cannot say that it does in the Chester play, but in the York 'Purification' the later style is very evident, and many traces of it appear in W of Co, and Co.

Joseph and Mary homeward bound.—Y opens with this. W of Co agrees throughout the scene. Croo's adaptation places them upon a 'for pageant,' yet puts words into Mary's mouth that imply the journey. Ch introduces Mary with eight verses that are evidently patchwork. Mary says that she wishes the child had not left them, but advises in the first stanza borrowed from the York play that they proceed on their journey. Her later appearance in the temple is wholly unaccounted for. The remainder of the first stanza in Y is omitted in Ch.

The introduction of the Doctors.—In Y and W of Co the Doctors prepare to announce the law to all comers. In Co a similar subject receives very different treatment. In W the talk is of the prophecies of Christ.

Jesus's salutation,—

- Y. Lordingis, lowe be with you leutte,
 And mirthis be yn-to this mene.
 W of Co. Lordis moche lowe with you be lent,
 And pes be amonge this company,
 W. Masters, luf be with you lent,
 And mensk be unto this meneye.

The salutation and the attempt of the Doctors to send the child away are not found in Ch. A different salutation is found in Co, and also an attempt to send Jesus away.

Primus Magister and Secundus Magister address Jesus.—The speeches agree in Y, W, and W of Co.

Tertius Magister addresses Jesus.—In Y, W, and Ch he invites Jesus to come and learn; in W of Co he asserts that the child is too young, but his speech is evidently modeled on Y in phraseology, and follows a cue given in the next speech of Primus Magister in Y.

Jesus's reply.—This agrees in Y, W, and W of Co, is expanded in Ch, with some slight likeness to Co.

The Doctors answer.—Y gives this in four verses, W agrees, W of Co gives two verses to Primus Magister and two to Secundus Magister. Ch gives the four to one speaker, and adds four as an expansion of the statement that Jesus is too young.

Jesus's reply.—This agrees in Y and W, is slightly expanded in W of Co, omitted in Ch.

Secundus Magister answers.—Agreement in Y and W of Co; in W he speaks the first two verses and Tertius Magister the remaining four. (This was probably the original plan.) Ch gives Secundus Magister four lines of different content.

Jesus declares his power—

The holy ghost has on me light, in four verses. Agreement of Y, W, W of Co, Ch.

Primus Magister answers.—This agrees in Y and W, is paraphrased in W of Co, is expanded from two to four verses in Ch.

Jesus declares—

Certis, I was or ye,
 And schall be aftir you.

In Y, W, and W of Co, Primus Magister replies in a long speech. Jesus states that he will declare the truth. Primus Magister wonders where the child could have learned such wisdom. In the above, Y, W of Co, and W agree, W furnishing in some points the better text. Ch departs from the model, transferring from a later position a speech of Tertius Mag. and of Primus Mag.—each speech of four verses—in favor of sending Jesus away.

Secundus Mag., in W of Co Tertius Mag., expresses the hope that Jesus has come “to salfe oure sare.” Here Ch agrees even in rime-series, though with variation of wording.

Jesus offers to give proof.—Tertius Mag., Primus Mag. in W of Co, asks for the first commandment. This is omitted in Ch.

Jesus replies that they have their books, and invites them to read. Ch departs slightly from the model.

Primus Mag., Secundus Mag. in W of Co, answers—

I rede this is the firste bidding.

The remaining three lines agree closely in language.

Jesus expounds the two commandments of love to God and love to man, in eighteen verses in Y and W. These lines W of Co cuts down to four verses.

Primus Mag., Tertius Mag. in W of Co, asks him for the remaining commandments. This interruption is omitted in Ch.

Jesus gives the commandments, with interesting differences among the plays.—In Ch the version is free and not minute; in Y literal with omission of explanatory phrases; in W some three verses are generally added to the Y statement; W of Co stands between Y and W, but nearer to W. Second Mag. in Y and W, Tertius in Ch, Primus in W of Co, declares that Jesus speaks the truth. Tertius Mag., and Primus Mag. in Y, W, and W of Co, are in favor of sending Jesus away, lest he should rob them of their fame. These speeches have been transferred in Ch to an earlier position in the play. This is a proof that the order of the play in the other cycle is older than that of Ch, an important point.

Mary and Joseph lament because they cannot find their child.—In this Y, W, and W of Co agree, but Ch omits this introduction of their return. Mary discovers Jesus sitting among the Doctors. In Y, W, and W of Co Joseph expresses thankfulness; in Ch there is no interruption of Mary's remarks. Mary requests Joseph to go to Jesus. Here the Ch rime-series proves the derivation of the play from Y. Joseph dares not meddle with men of might “in fures fyne.” In this all plays agree.

Mary tells Joseph that they will respect his age. Joseph responds that he does not know how to address them.

Mary offers to go with him.

Joseph wishes Mary to go first—This little episode is omitted in Ch, but appears to belong to the original play.

Mary addresses Jesus.—Agreement of Y and W. Immaterial changes in W of Co, speech reduced to four verses of free paraphrase in Ch.

Jesus replies.—Agreement among W of Co, Ch, and Y. W adds verses after the manner of W in the 'Harrowing of Hell.'

Joseph addresses Jesus in Y and W, but Mary addresses Jesus in W of Co and Ch. This is a significant difference.

An angel closes the Ch play. In Y and W the closing agrees, although W has preserved the proper assignment of parts to the Doctors, which in Y have all been given to one speaker. W of Co shows Croo's handiwork in a tedious closing.

Such, then, is the play of 'Christ with the Doctors in the Temple.' A few inferences can be drawn from these facts:—

First. The play, as found in W of Co, divides into three parts: the Play of the Prophets; the Play of Simeon, Anna, and the Coming to the Temple; the Play of Christ among the Doctors. With the last only have we any concern.

Secondly. The original play was the present York play, the slight errors of the scribe of the Register being eliminated.

Thirdly. The compiler of W took the Y play, but not from the Register, and interpolated or expanded according to his known custom, but with fewer changes than usual.

Fourthly. W of Co, in the matter of the commandments, appears to lean upon W rather than upon Y.

Fifthly. Ch, because of the transposition of the two speeches of the Doctors, is probably later than the other plays, and because of agreement with W of Co in Mary's speech, when Joseph speaks in the other plays, is without much doubt a borrowing from Coventry before the days of Robart Croo, i. e. before 15—. This dependence upon W of Co does not, however, apply to the whole play in Ch. The scene of Simeon and Anna is in the metre of the cycle, the scene of Christ in the Temple is in quatrains.

Sixthly. It is demonstrated, then, that the craft-gilds of Coventry were conversant with the gild plays of the North, and that the Chester plays form also a composite cycle, as truly as do the plays of W and Y, though composite to a less extent.

If the plays of the remaining craft cycles, those of Newcastle-on-Tyne, Beverley, Worcester, and others if there were others, were extant, it is probable that many other points of agreement could be established. These plays were not acted in a corner. The Mercers of Shrewsbury fined a brother that absented himself from their Corpus Christi procession to visit the play at Coventry.<sup>1</sup> The people flocked to these plays from distances that were then considered great. Nothing could be more reasonable than that the players of one city should take note of the successful plays of another, and seek to incorporate such plays into the home cycle.

---

XXVI.

CORRESPONDENCE OUTSIDE OF THE PARENT CYCLE.

In the Woodkirk plays are found portions of three York plays not included in the parent cycle. These York plays are—

Y XXXIV. Christ Led up to Calvary.

Y XXXVIII. The Resurrection.

Y XLVIII. The Judgment Day.

The York play, 'Christ Led up to Calvary,' agrees in subject with W 'Flagellacio,' which has been already the subject of our discussion.<sup>2</sup> We have recognized one scene of the tormentors as the work of our earliest comedy writer, to whom we have also assigned certain other portions of the W cycle.

The second scene begins with 'Johannes Apostolus,' and corresponds to the second scene of the York play. An examination of this may inform us as to the genesis of the play.

Stanza 10. W impairs verse movement by introducing 'so,' 'we,' substitutes 'Caiphas' for 'bushoppe,' 'fled' for 'went,' 'fals witnes' for 'soteltes,' destroys alliteration four times. W omits stanza 11, gives stanza 12. A leaf is lost in Y. Portions of stanza 13, and of one following the lost leaf and numbered by Miss Smith 14, and stanza 15, bring the Y play to the introduction of Jesus bearing the cross. W apparently agrees in general with the lost Y, but introduces Mary's attempt to take the cross, and departs otherwise from the Y stanzas extant.

W may paraphrase Y stanzas 16 and 17, or these stanzas may depend directly upon the Biblical narrative as given in some church play.

Y stanza 19 follows in W. W omits Y 20 and the first part of Y 21. In Y the women leave in stanza 21, but in W they must have left in Y 19, thus abridging the altercation with the soldiers.

---

<sup>1</sup> Hibbert, F. A. The Influence and Development of English Gilds, p. 63.

<sup>2</sup> See p. 155.

W and Y agree for the remainder of Y 21, W omits two speeches in Y 22, agreeing with Y in the last of the stanza. W contains Y 23 and 24, omits Y 25, gives 26, 27, 28, 29, and closes.

It is evident that the York play is the older, and has been cut down for insertion into the Woodkirk.

The Woodkirk play suffers resolution into—

First. An introduction of Pilate, in four stanzas.

Secondly. The scene of the tormentors, which was written by the author of 'Processus Noe,' 'Prima Pastorum,' 'Secunda Pastorum,' 'Magnus Herodes,' Introduction to 'Conspiracio et Captio,' and 'Processus Talentorum.'

Thirdly. The remainder of the play, which is the York play, scene second, with omissions and slight alteration.

We will next consider the play, 'The Resurrection.'

Y contains five stanzas before the centurion is mentioned, W six. These stanzas are in the same metre in the two versions, and, so far as I can determine, of equal age. The seventh stanza in W is irregular through an attempt to fuse two stanzas, the second of which is Y 6 with the omission of two verses. This would argue an attempt to piece the W introduction to the Y play. The plays agree in stanzas 6 and 7. York then omits twenty-five lines of the original play, which W gives. These contain an account of the marvels for which the line in Y—prepares. Y substitutes stanza 8 for this passage.

What may þes meruayles signifie?

Throughout the remainder of the play there is occasionally the displacing of single stanzas; thus, stanzas 22, 32, 44, 47, 63, 66, 67, and 69 of the York play do not appear in the Woodkirk, and full stanzas of W, after Y lines 114, 126, 186, 388, are different from the York, though following the thought closely.

The most noteworthy insertion is that of the monologue of Jesus, which W has in common with Chester.

The variations between these plays are less marked than we have found them hitherto. Both writers use the same metre, and the variant portions are so welded to the common text that neither Y nor W is the type to the exclusion of the other. I have fancied that the variants of W were more lyrical than those of Y, but cannot state it with certainty.

It would seem that in the time of these later plays the poets were conversant with a considerable body of devotional poetry. They wrote, taking excerpts and turns of expression from contemporaneous literature, and we shall find it difficult to estimate the independence of any single author, unless we saturate our minds with the non-dramatic poetry of their day.

The discussion of Y 'The Judgment Day' need not delay us long. The 'Juditium' is the corresponding W play. The Y play is throughout by one author. The W play displaces the first eighteen stanzas by a new introduction, all of which is lost except the last stanza. The second wicked soul follows with three stanzas agreeing in W and Y.<sup>1</sup> W then inserts thirty-two lines which are spoken by 'Quartus Malus,' after which it continues with Y 22.

The two striking features of the play are, first, the non-dramatic character of the second scene, which might very easily be an adaptation of a devotional monologue of Dens or Jesus, such as abound in the devotional poetry of the day; and, secondly, the introduction of the satirical comedy of Tutivillus in W, mention of which has been made in an earlier chapter.

In closing this discussion of the affiliation of the cycles, it may be well to emphasize the relation of church plays to certain agreements that exist among the cyclic plays, since Hertrich<sup>2</sup> and Hohlfeld<sup>3</sup> have cited such coincidences as proof of interdependence among the cycles. We have stated above the reason for distinguishing the coincidences which accompany notable actions as correspondences due to familiar knowledge of the plays through frequent repetition rather than through acquaintance with texts. Such sentences do not argue derivation from a common text, but rather dependence upon church plays in which a conventional expression accompanies a mark-worthy action.

Such expressions abound in the plays, and further reference to them would be unnecessary, were it not for the prominence that other investigators have given them. Suffice it here, that I consider of this character Hertrich's reference to Y XVIII, and Hohlfeld's to Y XIII, XVII, and XXXVI. As to the verses culled by Hohlfeld from Y XLIII and W XXIV, they are so literally translated from Mark XVI, 17-18, that I think them unsafe data for any argument of direct connection between the plays themselves.

<sup>1</sup> In Y XXXIV the third soldier is named Sir Wymond. In the Romance of Athelston the earl of Dover is Sir Wymond. Cp. Die Romanze von Athelston in Englische Studien, vol. 13, p. 332.

<sup>2</sup> Hertrich, p. 6.

<sup>3</sup> Anglia, vol. II, p. 254.

XXVII.

CONCLUSION.

In the foregoing pages an attempt has been made to explore one of the sources of the English drama, and to solve some of the problems presented to us in the mass of inchoate dramatic material known as the English Mystery Plays.

Literary motives know no national boundaries ; therefore it is not surprising that we find our English plays in close connection with the French, and can watch in the Italian and German the action of the national spirit under diverse literary influences upon a common literary material. But this inheritance came from the mother church. The church in the Middle Ages was the conservator of letters. A spirit of devotion produced the church drama. A comprehension of this drama within the church, and of the causes that gave rise to it, can be gained only through the study of the liturgy and of its sources, which, in turn, leads us back to the foundation of the church itself.

The exploration of the dramatized Bible story necessitated, therefore, a sketch of the growth of dramatic symbolism in the early liturgy. It has been shown in outline how the church on the one hand drew into its service dramatic elements from the Greek, and, on the other, sought in the West a more materialistic phrasing for its thought. When these materialistic conceptions found final issue in transubstantiation, the symbolic drama became a true tragedy, and the cycle of the liturgy became the prototype of the cyclic play.

Little by little the plays that clustered about the two most touching festivals of the church, the Crucifixion and the Birth of Christ, approached each other, and the whole antecedent Bible story, together with the doom of saint and sinner, fell naturally into place as cause and consequence of these two central movements of a world drama.

All literary activities were drawn into line with the church, or denounced as impious. The material through which the spirit of the day could best and most safely express itself was the church drama. As a consequence, the religious drama that arose therefrom represents most accurately those ill-defined movements of the national spirit which determine a literature as national.

This religious drama became the truest exponent of the folk-spirit when it had passed from the church through the Puy to the Confré-rie in France, to the Meistersänger in Germany, or to the craft-gild in England. Its fraternization with the comedy of the hedge-rows, last scion of the ancient dramatic stock, produced the Feast of Fools and the Feast of the Ass in France. Touched with the spirit of earnest criticism which gives to England her power of self-renovation, it became in its last days the precursor of the satirical comedy in politics and manners. Its unorganized mass has been a quarry of literary material for later authors, and motives kindred to our thought are still found within its content.

In France the plays were more especially the exponent of the literati and of the nobility, but in England they pulsed with the life of the crafts. Religious, philanthropic, and economic motives lay at the basis of the gild life. The processions, pageantry, and votive offerings, through which the gild expressed its corporate devotion, presented faithfully the religious spirit of the artisan. Through an adaptation of pageantry, its customary vehicle of homage, the civic body did honor to its earthly sovereign in the Royal Entry. A common spirit shaped a common material to religious, divertive and political ends, in procession, pageantry, and play. Therefore pageantry and processional customs bear directly upon the problems of the plays, and must be continually kept in mind as oftentimes conditioning the form of the play itself.

The craft plays were the favorite literature of the people for about two centuries. In them are embedded phases of thought prevalent in successive generations of men. Their sympathy with life foretokens the drama of life, the Shakespeare who purifies the native drama in the alembic of the classic.

Since a cycle, as that of York, was the expression of the mind of generations, it might be expected that its contents would change as successive standards of taste or opinion prevailed. As each play was in great measure the peculiar property of one gild, its fortunes must have been intimately connected with those of the gild. A sumptuous pageant wagon and skilled actors fitly represented an opulent gild. A fusion of plays through the excision of scenes advertised the joint labors of weaker crafts. Thus it came about that a cycle contains the plays, independent or revised, of many writers of different periods and schools, and that these plays, when popular, passed from cycle to cycle, or influenced powerfully the style of new plays.

A lack of appreciation of this intimacy of connection between play and gild life and fortune, has heretofore prevented an earnest inquiry as to the possibly composite characters of the cycles. Such inquiry as has been made failed of results, because the key to the metrical problem was sought in the dialect, and not in the metrical forms. The plays as we have them are seriously modified by the labor of scribes. These scribes could, and oftentimes did, change the dialect essentially; the metrical structure they could reduce to ruins, but could not destroy beyond the possibility of restoration. If, therefore, the individuality, locality, and relative date of stanzaic structures were once established, a sure key would be placed in the hands of the investigator, through which he could read the secrets of the cycles.

With the establishment and definition of the Northern septenar stanza the segregation of a parent York cycle becomes possible, and the composite character of single plays of the Woodkirk cycle is made evident. The connections among the four cycles now reveal themselves, and the commanding position of the York plays can no longer be questioned.

The Mysteries constitute the most important body of connected literature in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. They contain the work of many authors, writing on related subjects in different styles and metres. In this work very possibly every generation for two centuries is represented. The mass of material is sufficient, and its arrangement through the labors of successive authors on single plays is such, that the Mystery Plays must become the most important source of literary history for their time, and the determining factor in many dialectal questions.

This monograph simply opens the field for other workers. If it has demonstrated the significance of stanzaic structure, unlocked the cycles, justified the segregation of certain plays as a parent cycle, proved the interdependence of the four craft-cycles in the two extant Coventry plays, established characteristics of workmanship and the relative dates of two or three authors, the labor of a year will not have been in vain. Such a result, however, raises more questions than it settles, and invites other explorers. Some first steps may have been taken, but final results must be the work of many scholars, and embrace the whole body of contemporaneous literature. Until some approximate statement of the connections between this literature and the early Elizabethan has been made, no just estimate can be formed of the proportions in which the national and classical elements combined to produce the golden age of English literature.

REC'D LD DEC 3 '69 -7PM

REC'D CIRC DEPT

DEC 8 '74

JUN 8 1970 21

REC'D LD JUN 5 10-6 PM 81

NOV 9 1970 38

REC'D CIRC DEPT

MAY 10 1974

MAY 10 1984

REC. CIR. APR 12 '84

DEC 4 '66 -2 PM

LOAN DEPT.

FEB 21 1967 92

FEB 21 1967 92

C030970258

THE UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA LIBRARY

